By mutual trust-disposition and settlement, dated 21st December 1878, the spouses expressed themselves as desirous of exercising the powers conferred upon them by the contract of marriage with regard to the fee of the sums thereby conveyed, the fourth purpose of that deed being as follows:—"Fourthly, We direct our trustees to hold the whole residue of our estate and effects, including therein the several sums conveyed by the foresaid contract of marriage, and over which we have a power of appointment for behoof of the children of our marriage who may survive us, and the lawful issue of any who may predecease us, . . . but excluding always that one of our children who may have succeeded to the estate of Lochryan, and that in equal shares and proportions" (then followed a declaration that advances to any of the children should be taken into account and deducted from their shares), "and we direct the said trustees to pay to, or apply for behoof of, our said children the whole free annual income of our several estates, and that equally amongst them, share and share alike, and on the arrival of our sons at majority respectively to pay to or assign to each of them an equal share of our several estates, and on the marriage of our daughters respectively, to settle and secure on each daughter, for her sole and exclusive use during her marriage, an equal share of our several estates, so that the same shall be held by trustees for her behoof, exclusive always of the jus mariti and right of administration, or other right whatever of her husband, with power to her to dispose of the fee of the same by any testamentary deed, and failing her disposing of the same by such deed, the same shall be paid, assigned, or conveyed to her heirs and executors . . . and in regard to the disposal of the fee of the shares of any of our said daughters who may not marry, we direct the said trustees to pay, assign, or dispone the same according to the directions which each such daughter may leave by any testamentary deed; and failing the execution of such deed, to pay, assign, or convey the same to her heirs and executors: And we further direct the said trustees, on making payment of a share of our said estates to a son, or on settling a share for behoof of a daughter, to take the said son, or the trustees for behoof of such daughter, bound to repay the same, but without the addition of interest, and so that the same may form an addition to the funds available for division among our other children, in the event of such son or daughter succeeding to the said estate of Lochryan. . . .

Mr Wallace died on 8th June 1887, and Mrs Wallace on 4th April 1890. They left nine children, two sons and seven daughters, none of whom had at that date succeeded to the estate of Lochryan. The daughters were all unmarried.

A difference having subsequently arisen between the trustees under the marriage-contract and those under the trust-disposition and settlement in regard to the administration and disposal of the two sums of £5000 conveyed to the marriage-contract trustees as above narrated, a special case was presented to which the parties were (1) the marriage-contract trustees; (2) the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement; (3) the two sons; and (4) the daughters.

The only questions to which it is necessary to advert were the following, as amended at the bar:—"(2) Is the provision in the said trust-disposition and settlement directing the trustees on making payment of a share of the deceaseds' estate to a son, or settling a share for behoof of a daughter, to take the said son or the trustees for behoof of such daughter bound to repay the same in the event of such son or daughter succeeding to the estate of Lochryan, a condition which the spouses were entitled to adject to the appointment exercised by them under the powers reserved in the said contract of marriage, and ought it to receive effect? (3) Are the provisions in the said trust-disposition and settlement as regards the shares of the deceaseds' estates destined by the said marriage-contract to the fourth parties a valid exercise of powers reserved to the spouses in the said contract of marriage, and ought they to receive effect? or are the parties of the fourth part respectively entitled to payment of their shares of the said sums of £5000 on their respectively attaining majority, or being married, whichever of these events shall first happen?"

In regard to question 2, the third and fourth parties maintained that the provisions in the trust-disposition and settlement restricting the right of any child who might have succeeded to the estate of Lochryan at the time the sums of £5000 came to be divided, and providing, in the event of none of the third and fourth parties having succeeded to the estate at that time, that each of them or their trustees should come under an obligation to repay their share on thereafter succeeding, were inept and ineffectual, the spouses not having been entitled by the terms of the contract of marriage to impose the restrictions. The second parties maintained that the provisions should receive effect, and that they were bound to obtain an obligation to the effect in question.

In regard to question 3, the fourth parties maintained that they were entitled to payment of their shares upon their attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events should first happen. The second parties, on the other hand, maintained that the fourth parties were not entitled to payment of their shares, but that the same fell to be retained by the second parties until the marriage of any of the fourth parties, and on any of the fourth parties being married that her share fell to be conveyed to trustees to be held for her behoof in accordance with the provisions of the trust-disposition and settlement.

Argued for the first, third, and fourth parties;—(1) There was no case in which a provision binding trustees to obtain an obligation from a beneficiary to repay his share of the trust-estate in the event of his succeeding to something else had been put in force by the Court, and it could not be implemented. Besides, the imposition of such a restriction was not within the powers conferred by the marriage-contract. (2) The daughters' right to a share of the fee of the estate which was provided for in the marriage-contract could not be restricted, as in the mutual trust-disposition and settlement, to one of liferent with a power to test.

No. 176.

June 12, 1891. Wallace's Trustees v. Wallace.

Any condition or limitation imposed in the later deed must be consistent with the right of fee which was involved in the direction of the marriage-contract to "pay over the capital to or for the behoof of" the beneficiaries, which the condition or limitation in question was not.[1] The clause in the case of Lennock's Trustees was not the same as the present, for there the daughters had no general power of bequest, and there was no ulterior destination to the beneficiaries' own heirs and executors involving the introduction of strangers to the benefit.

Argued for the second parties;—(1) The true reading of the clause of gift was that every bequest was conditional upon the recipient not taking the estate of Lochryan. It was within the reserved power of appointment to impose such a condition.[2] (2) The power of appointment was validly exercised, and the use of the word "limitation" practically covered the creation of a trust.[3] This was confirmed by the terms of the direction "to pay to or for the behoof of." The trust-disposition professed to dispose of the whole fund, and did not give it to persons other than those mentioned in the marriage-contract.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The important question we have now to consider in this case is whether the power of appointment which the father and mother reserved to themselves has been well exercised in the mutual trust-deed and settlement which was executed by the spouses.

It appears to me that if the question had not been concluded by decision it would have been open to argument. But I am of opinion that it is impossible to distinguish the case of Lennock's Trustees from the present. The matter arose there for decision in exactly similar circumstances. The conditions and limitations of the power were expressed in precisely the same way. I therefore think the case of Lennock's Trustees is conclusive, and accordingly that the appointment is a good one.

Another question which has been put to us is in regard to the construction of the following clause,—"And we further direct the said trustees on making payment of a share of our said estates to a son, or on settling a share for behoof of a daughter, to take the said son or the trustees for behoof of such daughter bound to repay the same, but without the addition of interest, and so that the same may form an addition to the funds available for division among our other children, in the event of such son or daughter succeeding to the said estate of Lochryan." I do not very well see how that could ever become an operative condition. It appears to me to be quite ineffectual and ultra vires. But assuming that it is ultra vires, I think the law is clear; it is laid down as follows in Sugden upon Powers, p. 526,—"Where conditions are annexed to the gift, not authorised by the power, the gift is good, and the condition only is void, so that the appointee takes the fund absolutely." Holding the condition to be void, I think it has no effect upon the appointment in other respects.

LORD M'LAREN.—The most important of the questions we are asked to answer

[1] Gillon's Trustees v. Gillon, Feb. 8, 1890, 17 R. 435; Baikie's Trustees v. Oxley, Feb. 24, 1862, 24 D. 589, 34 Scot. Jur. 338; Moir's Trustees, June 11, 1871, 9 Macph. 848, 43 Scot. Jur. 462; Munro v. Munro, Feb. 13, 1810, F. C.

[2] Bonhotes v. Mitchell's Trustees, May 27, 1885, 12 R. 984.

[3] Lennock's Trustees v. Lennock, Oct. 16, 1880, 8 R. 14; Bryson's Trustees v. Clark, Nov. 26, 1880, 8 R. 142; Carver v. Bowles, 1831, 2 Russell and Myl. 304.

No. 176.
June 12, 1891.
Wallace's Trustees v. Wallace.

in this case relates to the exercise by the spouses of the powers reserved to them in the clause of the antenuptial marriage-contract dealing with their children's provisions. They reserve to themselves a qualified power of distribution. The children's provisions are to be paid to them by the trustees upon the death of the survivor of the spouses "in such shares or proportions, and subject to such conditions, provisions, and limitations" as the spouses, or the survivor of them, should appoint. There is a decision of the Second Division of the Court, which is directly in point,—the powers in that case (Lennock's Trustees v. Lennock) and in the deed before us are expressed in identical terms, and the powers were executed in substantially the same way. The Court there held that the power was well exercised, and I agree in the view that a power to apportion among the children of the marriage, and to impose conditions and limitations entitles the spouses, as is the case here, to direct that the fund be held by trustees for the daughters, the income to be paid to them for life, and they to have a testamentary power of disposal. Whether the exercise of such a power can be extended further so as to provide for the event of the daughters not availing themselves of the power of disposal, I give no opinion. I see great difficulty in the way of extending the signification of the reserved power, because, whenever a new course of succession is introduced, persons are taken in who are not proper objects of the power. Here the framers of the settlement have avoided that difficulty, and while they have provided that the daughters shall not have power to dispose of their shares by way of anticipation, they have at the same time given them the power of disposing of the fee by testamentary deed. So far, I think, the power of appointment has been vaidly exercised. On the other points of the case, I concur in the judgment proposed.

LORD KINNEAR and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the second question as amended at the bar in the negative; answer the first alternative of the third question as amended at the bar in the affirmative . . . and find, declare, and decern accordingly."

JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.—Agents.

No. 177.
June 13, 1891.
Mackenzie v. Ewart.

JAMES MACKENZIE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—M'Kechnie—J. C. Watt.
WILLIAM EWART AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Salvesen.

Bankruptcy—Cessio—Decree of cessio in debtor's absence—Form of interlocutor granting decree—Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 22), sec. 9.—The Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881, sec. 9, enacts, "if the debtor fail to appear in obedience to the citation under a process of cessio bonorum at any meeting to which he has been cited, and if the Sheriff shall be satisfied that such failure is wilful, he may, in the debtor's absence, pronounce decree of cessio bonorum."

In a petition for cessio, the Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators, in respect the debtor has failed to appear at this diet for examination as ordered by last interlocutor, and has not taken means to satisfy the Sheriff-substitute that his absence was not wilful, decerns the debtor . . . . to execute a disposition omnium bonorum."

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney, diss. Lord Trayner), reduced the decree in respect that the Sheriff-substitute had set forth a reason for granting decree other than that he was satisfied that the debtor's absence was wilful.

Question whether it was essential that the Sheriff in granting decree of cessio in the absence of the debtor should set forth the reason of his judgment.

No. 177.

June 13, 1891. Mackenzie v. Ewart.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. B.

IN March 1890, William Ewart, butcher, Alness, and Alexander John Dallas, solicitor, Tain, presented a petition for cessio in the Sheriff Court at Dornoch against James Mackenzie, farmer, Walkerdale, Sutherland, and on 18th March the Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie) pronounced an interlocutor by which he, inter alia, ordained the debtor to appear for examination on 15th April.

On 15th April the Sheriff (Low) on the application of the debtor's agent adjourned the proceedings until the 6th May.

On 6th May the debtor failed to appear for examination and the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the debtor has failed to appear at this diet for examination as ordered by last interlocutor, and has not taken means to satisfy the Sheriff-substitute that his absence was not wilful, decerns the debtor, James Mackenzie, farmer, Walkerdale, Rosehall, to execute a disposition omnium bonorum to and in favour of Robert Munro, writer in Tain, who is hereby appointed trustee for behoof of the creditors of the said debtor."

On 1st December the debtor brought an action against Ewart, Dallas, and Munro, concluding for reduction of this decree, inter alia, on the ground that it was disconform to statute in respect that it did not bear that the Sheriff-substitute was satisfied that the debtor's failure to appear was wilful.*

On 24th February 1891, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) assoilzied the defenders.†

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The decree was disconform to the statute and fell to be reduced. That statute, dealing as it did with cessio, which was truly a diligence, was strictissimi juris.[1] The object was to punish debtors who had been cited to attend meetings and who contumaciously absented themselves. Wilful absence of the debtor must be proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff, who must state in his interlocutor that he was satisfied that the absence was wilful; otherwise the clause had no application. Here it was impossible to say from the terms of the Sheriff-substitute's deliverance that he was satisfied that there had been wilful absence. When he said that the debtor had not taken means

* The Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881, sec. 9 enacts,—"If the debtor fails to appear in obedience to the citation under a process of cessio bonorum at any meeting to which he has been cited, and if the Sheriff shall be satisfied that such failure is wilful, he may, in the debtor's absence pronounce decree of cessio bonorum."

† "OPINION.— . . . 4. It was objected that the decree of cessio was disconform to the requirements of the statute. The statute authorises a decree in absence when the Sheriff is satisfied that the debtor's absence is wilful. In this case the Sheriff did not find this expressly, but found in effect that he was not satisfied that the debtor's absence was not wilful. It was represented that this clumsy use of the double negative expressed only that the Sheriff was not satisfied either way, and did not know whether the absence was wilful or not. If it were necessary to adopt that construction, the decreet would be bad. The interlocutor is very strangely and unfortunately expressed, but I construe it to mean that he was satisfied that the pursuer's absence from the meeting, which had been fixed on the motion of his own agent, was wilful, because not satisfactorily explained, and that the Sheriff-substitute was therefore in a position to pronounce decree. Whether his opinion that the absence was wilful was well-founded, or the reverse, I cannot consider. I must accept the interlocutor as correct. On the whole, although the interlocutor is open to obvious criticism, I do not think that the decree is reducible on the ground of the irregularity in the proceedings."

[1] Reid v. Somerville & Co., June 6, 1889, 16 R. 751.

No. 177.

June 18, 1891.

Mackenzie v. Ewart.

to satisfy him that his absence was not wilful, it was obvious that the Sheriff-substitute had not been able to make up his mind whether it was wilful or not.

Argued for the defender;—It was not imperative as matter of style that the Sheriff should state in his interlocutor that he was satisfied that the debtor's absence was wilful. He must merely be satisfied of the fact. When then he pronounced decree in the absence of the debtor, the obvious inference was that he had first satisfied himself that the absence was wilful. But taking the deliverance as it stood, although it might be open to criticism, fairly read it meant nothing else than that in absence of satisfactory explanation on the subject, the Sheriff-substitute was satisfied that the absence was wilful.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case a petition was presented against the pursuer for the purpose of having cessio ordered by the Sheriff-substitute, and it appears that upon the second occasion on which the matter was taken up in the Sheriff Court, and to which occasion the case had been adjourned, the pursuer was not present in Court. In these circumstances the Sheriff-substitute was entitled, if he was satisfied that the pursuer's absence was wilful, to grant decree of cessio at once.

The only question of real difficulty in the case is whether the Sheriff-substitute required as matter of form to state in his interlocutor pronounced in absence of the pursuer that he found the pursuer's absence was wilful.

I cannot say that I have formed a very definite opinion upon the matter, and I do not find it necessary to consider it here, because in point of fact the Sheriff did state what he found in the interlocutor which we have before us. He did not find expressly that the pursuer's absence was wilful, but that the pursuer "has not taken means to satisfy the Sheriff-substitute that his absence was not wilful."

Now, can that be taken as amounting to an expression by him that in his opinion the absence of the pursuer was wilful?

I am inclined upon the whole to think that it cannot. To find that a man has not taken means to shew that his absence was not wilful is different from finding that his absence was wilful. Whether the Sheriff does or does not require in an interlocutor granting decree of cessio in the wilful absence of the pursuer expressly to state that his absence is wilful, I am inclined at all events to say that where he does proceed to express the grounds of his decision in terms which do not necessarily imply that the absence was wilful, his interlocutor cannot stand. There must therefore be decree of reduction.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree in the course which your Lordship proposes.

I confess that I think, where a cessio is granted against an absent debtor, that it would be better in all cases as matter of style to say that the debtor's absence was wilful. I do not say that I think that such a statement is essential to the sustaining of the deliverance, but I think that it is in accordance with the proper form to be adopted in any case where there are such proceedings before the Sheriff.

Here the Sheriff-substitute has not made any such finding, but proceeds upon a totally different ground. He grants decree of cessio for a reason expressed in peculiar terms. He says,—"The Sheriff-substitute . . . in respect the debtor has failed to appear at this diet for examination as ordered by last interlocutor, and has not taken means to satisfy the Sheriff-substitute that his absence was not wilful, decerns the debtor . . . to execute a disposition omnium bonorum." That is the only reason stated by the Sheriff-substitute for granting cessio, and I think it is a reason which the statute does not warrant. I am therefore of opinion that we ought to reduce the decree.

No. 177.
June 13, 1891.
Mackenzie v. Ewart.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with Lord Rutherfurd Clark in thinking that it might be advisable for the Sheriff, when he is granting decree of cessio in the absence of a debtor, to find in his interlocutor granting decree that the debtor's absence was wilful. I do not think, however, that the want of such a finding by him would afford any ground for impugning the regularity of the procedure. The statute requires that the Sheriff shall be satisfied that the debtor's absence is wilful, but does not require in terms that he shall say so. But if the Sheriff pronounces a decree in absence of the debtor, I should hold that he had satisfied himself of what was antecedently necessary before he could pronounce decree, viz., that the debtor's absence was wilful.

But the difficulty here arises not from silence on the part of the Sheriff-substitute as to the debtor's absence being wilful, but from the fact that what is said on that subject by the Sheriff-substitute leaves it open to doubt whether he was satisfied that the absence was wilful or was not satisfied that it was not.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking the interlocutor is open to criticism, but I also think with him that the fair reading of the interlocutor is that the debtor's absence was held to be wilful because he had not explained his absence so as to satisfy the Sheriff-substitute that it was other than wilful. I should on these grounds be prepared to hold that the Sheriff's proceedings were in accordance with the statutory requirements, and that the decree of cessio should not be set aside.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK intimated that LORD YOUNG, who was present at the hearing, concurred in the judgment.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and granted decree of reduction.

A. P. PURVES & AITKEN, W.S.—ALEXANDER ROSS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 178.
June 13, 1891.
Walker v. Lang.

JAMES KING WALKER, Respondent and Appellant.—M'Kechnie—Maclaren.

JOHN LANG (Procurator-fiscal of the Dean of Guild Court of the City of Glasgow), Respondent.—Ure—Craigie.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Appeal—Jurisdiction—Exclusion of review—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), secs. 384 and 277.—In terms of sec. 384 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, the Master of Works gave notice to the proprietor of a back court, requiring him to fence it, and intimated that if he had any objections he must lodge the same in writing with the Clerk to the Police Commissioners within six days.

No objections were lodged, and thereafter the Dean of Guild, on the application of the Procurator-fiscal, after hearing the proprietor's objections, but without a record having been made up, pronounced an interlocutor, granting a warrant for the execution of the work at the proprietor's cost on the ground that there was danger to persons using the court from the want of a fence.

The proprietor having appealed, the Procurator-fiscal objected that the appeal

No. 178.

June 13, 1891.
Walker v. Lang.

was incompetent under sec. 277 of the Act,* in respect that no record had been made up.

The appellant contended that, as the public had no right of access to the court, the want of a fence could not be "dangerous" in the sense of the Act, and that the Dean of Guild had exceeded his jurisdiction in granting the warrant.

Held that the interlocutor was in pursuance of the Act, and that the appeal was incompetent, as no record had been made up.

Opinions that the Dean of Guild would not have been entitled to refuse a motion to have a record made up.

1ST DIVISION.
Dean of Guild of Glasgow.
C.

ON 19th December 1890, there was served upon James K. Walker, 65 Bath Street, Glasgow, a notice by the Master of Works of the city of Glasgow, in the following terms:—"By virtue and in terms of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866,† I hereby give notice to you that there is no fence for protecting the back court, . . . of which you are 'proprietor.' . . . And I hereby require you to execute the following work, in order to comply with the provisions of the said Act, viz.:—To erect an iron fence railing, . . . and to have the whole work completed in a tradesmanlike manner, and that within ten days from this date, to my entire satisfaction. If you consider yourself aggrieved by the requisition hereinbefore contained, you may, within six days hereafter, deliver to Mr John Lang, Clerk to the Police Commissioners, City Chambers, written objections signed by you, in order that the Magistrates or the Dean of Guild may inquire into, try, and decide the questions competently raised in such objections, in terms of the said Act."

Walker did not lodge written objections within the time required by the notice.

On 27th April 1891, a petition and application at the instance of John Lang, Procurator-fiscal of the Dean of Guild Court, for the public interest, was presented against Walker, and a warrant was asked to execute the work specified in the notice, "and thereafter to ascertain and fix the cost thereof, and decern against the defender" for the same, "all in terms of and to the effect provided for in the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, before referred to."

Of the same date the Dean appointed the petition to be served upon Walker.

On 15th May 1891, the parties were heard before the Dean.

The Dean pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the objections now stated to the notice by the Master of Works ought to have been intimated, in terms of the Act, within six days from the date when the notice was served upon the defender; therefore repels the same: Finds that the back court referred to in the petition is surrounded by an area about 10 feet in width and from 3 feet 6 inches to 4 feet 9 inches in depth without any fence or protection, and is consequently dangerous to those requiring to use said court: Grants warrant to the petitioner to execute the operations specified in the notice by the Master of Works as craved, and quoad ultra continues the case."

* Section 277 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, enacts,—"Every proceeding before the Dean of Guild in pursuance of this Act shall be subject to the following rules and regulations. . . . Where a record is not made up the decision given by the Dean of Guild shall be final, and not subject to suspension, advocation, or appeal, or to any other form of review, or stay of execution."

† The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 384, enacts,—"The Master of Works may, by notice given in manner hereinafter provided, require any proprietor or occupier of a land or heritage to fence the same, or repair any chimney-stalk or flue, or any chimney-head or can, or any rhone, signboard, or other thing connected with or appertaining to any building thereon, which appears to be dangerous, to his entire satisfaction."

No. 178.

June 13, 1891. Walker v. Lang.

Walker appealed.

The respondent objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—The proceedings adopted by the Master of the Works, and subsequently by the respondent, were not proceedings founded upon the common law.[1] They were proceedings "in pursuance" of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, in the sense of the 277th section of that Act, and as no record had been made up, they were not subject to review.

Argued for the appellant;—Section 384 gave the Master of Works power by notice to require "the proprietor or occupier of a land or heritage to fence the same." The notice was to be enforced by the procurator-fiscal of the Dean of Guild Court. The section must therefore be restricted to the case where the land or heritage unfenced was a source of danger to the public. The appellant's ground was not accessible to the public, and could not therefore be a source of danger to the public. The notice was not then authorised by section 384, and therefore, together with the petition and application following thereon, it could not be held to be "in pursuance" of the Act. Section 277 was therefore inapplicable. If the respondent's view were sound, the Dean of Guild, by refusing to allow a record to be made up, might prevent appeal in any case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think we are bound to sustain the objection to the competency of this appeal. The Glasgow Police Act of 1866 in section 277 provides that "where a record is not made up the decision given by the Dean of Guild shall be final, and not subject to suspension, advocation, or appeal, or to any other form of review." Now, these words are quite plain in their meaning, and not susceptible of construction. The only difficulty suggested by our sustaining the objection to competency is that it may entitle the Dean of Guild to refuse to allow a record to be made up. Now, I am not moved by this suggestion, for if the Dean of Guild took that course he would exceed his jurisdiction, and there would certainly be a remedy in this Court notwithstanding the 277th section. I am therefore for sustaining the objection to the competency of the appeal.

LORD ADAM.—The 384th section of the Glasgow Police Act provides that "the master of works may by notice, given in manner hereinafter provided, require any proprietor or occupier of a land or heritage to fence the same, or repair any chimney-stalk or flue, or any chimney-head or can, or any sign, signboard, or other thing connected with or appertaining to any building therein which appears to be dangerous, to his entire satisfaction." The "manner hereinafter provided" refers to section 386, which again refers us back to sections 321 and 322 for the particulars which require to be stated in any such notice and also the objections which may be lodged thereto. Section 322 provides that "if any proprietor to whom such notice has been given considers himself aggrieved by the requisition therein contained, he may, within six days thereafter, deliver to the clerk written objections signed by him," and then follows the procedure to be observed. The procurator-fiscal shall apply to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to cite the objecting proprietor, and the Dean of Guild is thereupon to inquire into and to decide the question raised.

Now, what took place was this: The Master of the Works served a notice under the 384th section on the appellant, setting forth the particulars required by section 321. Thereafter the appellant's duty was to have appeared and [1] Allan v. Whyte, Dec. 20, 1890, 18 R. 332.

No. 178.

June 18, 1891.
Walker v. Lang.

lodged objections, if he so desired, and to have had the case heard upon a record.

The appellant, however, did not take that course, and the case was handed over to the respondent, the Procurator-fiscal, in order that the notice might be enforced in terms of section 322 of the Act, and accordingly, on 27th April 1891, the Procurator-fiscal presented a petition and application to the Dean of Guild for that purpose, and his interlocutor is now here under review.

That brings us to the question whether under the 277th section the interlocutor of the Dean can be appealed against. By that section, it is provided that "Every proceeding before the Dean of Guild in pursuance of this Act shall be subject to the following rules and regulations," and there follows,—"Where a record is not made up, the decision given by the Dean of Guild shall be final, and not subject to suspension, advocation, or appeal, or to any other form of review or stay of execution." Here no record was made up, nor was any motion made to the Dean for leave to have a record made up. When the petition and application came up for hearing on the 15th May, the appellant had an opportunity of putting himself in a position to make a competent appeal by moving for a record, but this he failed to do.

The question then is, was this a proceeding "in pursuance of the Act"? I have not the least doubt that it was. It was not in any form or sense a common law proceeding.

I am therefore of opinion, on the whole matter, that as the proceedings shew ex facie that they were taken upon the authority of the Glasgow Police Act, and not at common law, and as no record was made up, section 277 applies, and excludes the interlocutor appealed against from our review.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion.

Machinery has been provided in the Act whereby any fair question of law upon the construction of the statute may be brought by appeal to the superior Court, the necessary preliminary being that there should be a record made up, so that the Court may know what is the question between the parties.

Now, when provision is made for appeal under certain conditions and these are not complied with, I think the party must be held responsible for the want of success of his own appeal. He had means provided him by statute, and he has neglected to use them.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The decision appealed against is one pronounced by the Dean of Guild in the exercise of his jurisdiction, and arose out of proceedings in pursuance of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, and not out of proceedings at common law. No record was made up, and I am therefore of opinion that appeal is excluded by section 277.

I quite agree with your Lordship that the statute does not give the Dean of Guild a discretionary power to refuse to allow a record to be made up. That is a right which parties have by statute, and the Dean cannot prevent their exercising it.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties upon the competency, sustain the objection to the competency of the appeal, dismiss the appeal."

WM. HENRY CURR, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 179.

June 18, 1891.

Allan v. Roberton's Trustees.

MRS HANNA KEIR OR ALLAN, Pursuer (Appellant).—Black.
JAMES ROBERTON'S TRUSTEES, Defenders (Respondents).—Salvesen.

Reparation—Lease—House rendered uninhabitable owing to mineral workings of persons other than landlord.—A lease of a house contained a stipulation that the landlord should keep the house wind and water-tight. The house was rendered uninhabitable during the currency of the lease by subsidence caused by the mineral operations of a coal company in the vicinity who were not tenants of the landlord, but who had encroached upon his minerals. The tenant raised an action against the landlord for the damage sustained by the landlord failing to keep the house wind and water-tight.

The Court assoilzied the defender, holding that he was not bound to restore the subjects to a habitable condition, and was not liable in damages for failing to do so, the house having been destroyed by the fault of others for whom he was not responsible.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire, at Airdrie. M.

IN May 1886, Mrs Hanna Keir or Allan became tenant under Mr James Roberton, of Lauchope, of a house and ground at Parkneuk, in the county of Lanark, by lease dated 17th May 1886, for a period of five years, at a rent of £9.

The lease provided,—"The proprietor agrees to keep the roof of the houses water-tight, but the interior of the houses are to be kept in repair by the tenant."

Mrs Allan entered into occupation of the subjects under the lease.

In January 1888 damage was suddenly caused to the buildings by a subsidence arising from mineral workings, and on 14th September thereafter Mrs Allan abandoned the premises in consequence of their having become uninhabitable.

She thereupon presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie against her landlord in which she prayed the Court to ordain him to pay her £50 as damages.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having suffered damage by the failure of the defender to make and keep the house let by him to the pursuer wind and water-tight, though informed of its condition, the defender is bound to compensate her for the loss and injury thereby sustained. (4) The defender was bound to maintain the pursuer in the occupancy of the said house, and he, having failed to do so, is liable in the damage sustained by the pursuer in consequence of such failure.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defender having on his part fulfilled the obligations under which he came to the pursuer, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced. (4) The damage to said house not being caused by the fault of the defender or his tenants the defender is not responsible for any loss or damage to pursuer that may have arisen therefrom.

Mr Roberton having died in the course of the action, his trustees were sisted as defenders.

It was proved that on one night early in January 1888 a subsidence from mineral workings took place, and seriously rent both the front and back walls of the house. It was further proved that the Legbrannock Coal Company, the tenants of a neighbouring coalfield not the property of Mr Roberton, had encroached on his minerals, and had about the time of the accident been working these up to a point within about 30 feet from the east end of the house, and that this encroachment was the cause of the accident. The proof shewed that the damage was very serious, and that without rebuilding the walls the house could not have been restored to a tenantable condition.

No. 179.

June 13, 1891.
Allan v. Roberton's Trustees.

On 27th May 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Mair) having considered the proof awarded the pursuer £25 in name of damages.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry), on 21st November 1890, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that in January 1888 the walls of the said house became seriously cracked and the house otherwise injured through a subsidence arising from mineral workings in the immediate neighbourhood; that the mineral workings which caused the said subsidence were those of persons for whom the original defender was not responsible: . . . . Finds in law . . . . that the defenders are not liable in damages for the loss sustained by the pursuer through the injuries caused to the house, or through her having removed therefrom, or through failure on the part of the original defender to restore the house to a tenantable condition: Therefore recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action."

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The landlord was liable to his tenant for damage due to subsidence, where the excavations which caused the subsidence were upon the landlord's own mineral estate. In order to avoid circuity of action, the tenant here preferred to proceed directly against the landlord, although third parties were the wrongdoers.[1] (2) The landlord had refused to implement his agreement to repair and rebuild the premises.

Argued for the defender;—The pursuer's remedy was directly against the wrongdoing coal company.[2] There was no need for her to proceed against the landlord, whose only contract with the pursuer was to keep the subjects water-tight, and who was clearly not answerable for the acts of third parties.[3]

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuer of this action was tenant of a house and ground at Parkneuk, in the county of Lanark, under a lease granted by the late Mr Roberton, of Lauchope. That lease was dated in May 1886, and was to endure for five years. In September 1888, however, the pursuer abandoned the premises let to her in consequence of the same having been rendered uninhabitable through the mining operations of the Legbrannock Coal Company in the vicinity thereof. These operations resulted, as the proof shews, in the practical destruction of the house, and in damage to the pursuer's furniture, as well as to a wooden shed which she had erected for a piggery. For the damage thus sustained she seeks by this action to make her landlord liable. The Sheriff-substitute decided in favour of the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £25, but on appeal the Sheriff recalled that judgment and assoilzied the defender. I am clearly of opinion that the Sheriff was right.

The pursuer can only succeed in her action on shewing that she has suffered damage through breach of contract on the part of the defender, or through wrong done by him. Now, the only contract between the parties was the contract of lease. Under that contract the landlord's obligation was to maintain the subjects let wind and water-tight, and to repair whatever in the fabric of the building became defective through natural decay. But the landlord was under no obligation to restore or rebuild the subjects if they were destroyed by damnum fatale, or by the fault of others for whom he was not responsible. That, however, is what happened. The workings of the Legbrannock Company, who

[1] Menzies v. Whyte, Feb. 29, 1888, 15 R. 470; Kidd v. Byrne, Byrne v. Johnston, Dec. 16, 1875, 3 R. 255.

[2] Addison on Torts, 411.

[3] Duff v. Fleming, May 18, 1870, 8 R. 769.

No. 179.

June 13, 1891. Allan v. Roberton's Trustees.

were not the tenants of Roberton, destroyed the pursuer's house, and the lease thus came to an end rei interitu,—not through any fault of the landlord. It appears clear enough, therefore, that no claim arises against Mr Roberton (or his representatives, who are now the defenders) on the ground of breach of contract. It is not alleged that Mr Roberton failed to fulfil all the obligations incumbent on him before the destruction of the pursuer's house. Nor has she any claim against the defenders on the ground of wrong. The wrong from which she suffered was done not by the defender but by third parties, whose conduct was not in any way under the defender's control. If the pursuer has a claim in respect of the damage she has sustained (and it appears more than probable she has), it is a claim against the wrongdoer, but not against the defender.

The pursuer maintained that she was entitled to damages against the defender on the ground that after the destruction of her house he had agreed to rebuild or repair the same so as to make it suitable for her occupation, and that he had failed to do so. I think this part of the pursuer's case is not proved.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact in terms of the findings in fact in the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 21st November 1890: Dismiss the appeal, and affirm the interlocutor appealed against: Of new assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action."

A. STEWART GRAY, W.S.—H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 180.

June 13, 1891.* Earl of Home v. Assessor for Dundee.

EARL OF HOME, Appellant.—C. K. Mackenzie.
ASSESSOR FOR DUNDEE, Respondent.

Valuation-roll—Buildings unlet and unfit for occupation.—A piece of ground in the neighbourhood of a large manufacturing town was let to the Crown for 94 years, and buildings thereon were occupied as military barracks. On the expiration of this lease the buildings reverted to the proprietor, and were unoccupied. They were entered in the roll at £305, the rent at which they were entered when occupied by the Crown. It was proved that they could not be let without considerable outlay being made to alter their condition.

The Court reduced the valuation to £100, consented to by the proprietor.

Observed (per Lord Wellwood) that the valuation might fall to be increased if the proprietor delayed in the future to render the subjects fit for occupation.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. Ld. Kyllachy. Ld. Wellwood.

AT a Valuation Court for the city and burgh of Dundee, held on 12th September 1890, to dispose of appeals against the valuation of the Assessor of the city and burgh, the Earl of Home appealed against the valuation of subjects in Barrack Park, Dundee, which were entered in the Valuation-roll at £305.

Case 127.

The Magistrates sustained the valuation, and his Lordship appealed. From the case it appeared that the subjects in question consisted of three large buildings in the Barrack Park of Dudhope, Dundee, formerly in the occupancy of the Crown (War Department), and used as (1) a military barracks, (2) officers' quarters, and (3) an hospital, together with the adjoining ground, chiefly occupied and required for access to the buildings.

* Decided Feb. 17, 1891.

No. 180.

June 13, 1891.

Earl of Home v. Assessor for Dundee.

Prior to Martinmas 1889 the subjects, which belonged to the appellant, had been held by the Crown as subtenant under a ninety-four years' sublease (the principal lease being for ninety-nine years). Under the Crown's sublease the rent payable for the ground and barracks together amounted to £163, 16s. Up to 1887-88, the Crown not being subject to taxation, it was not considered of practical importance to insist on a valuation of Crown property. The question having been raised by various public bodies throughout the kingdom as to whether the Crown, as a matter of expediency, might not voluntarily bear their share of local assessments, the War Office was approached in this instance to consent to include the buildings erected by the Crown in the valuation. In 1887-88 the consent of the Rating Department of the Treasury was obtained to include the whole buildings in cumulo as of the annual value of £305, and as belonging to and occupied by the Crown. They had remained at that sum ever since, and the Crown had paid rates upon them till now both as owners and occupiers. The tenancy of the Crown ceased at Martinmas 1889, and the subjects had since been in the possession of the appellant and unoccupied. No rent had since been paid for them by any party to the appellant. The appellant led evidence to shew that the subjects could not be let in their present condition for any purpose, and that an expenditure of £1000 would be necessary so to alter their condition as to give them a lettable value. The appellant stated that he was willing that the subjects should be entered at the nominal value of £100. The Assessor maintained that the question to be considered was, what the subjects would bring as rent in their actual state for any purpose. No attempt had been made to let them, and he maintained that it was groundless to say that three large substantial buildings in a great manufacturing town would not let for any purpose, either as storehouses, warehouses, or otherwise.

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—In this case we think the valuation should be £100 and not the old rent. On the evidence the barracks could not be let in their present condition for any purpose. Considerable expense will be necessary to make them lettable, and therefore as the buildings stand they really have no lettable value at all. While I am of opinion that for this year the valuation should be reduced to a nominal sum, I do not want to lead the appellant to suppose that this state of matters can go on indefinitely. There will probably be a limit to the time for consideration as to what should be done with the buildings. The question may be different next year if nothing has been done to the buildings to render them fit for occupation.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur. All I decide is, that the old valuation of £305 is not a proper valuation for the subjects in their present condition. What the proper valuation for the subjects may ultimately be found to be I do not inquire. All I say is, that £100, on which the appellant is willing to pay, appears on the information before us to be ample.

THE COURT were of opinion that the Magistrates' decision was wrong, and that the annual value should be reduced to the sum of £100.

ROBERT STRATHERN, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 181.

June 13, 1891.*
Aberdeen Cemetery Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Aberdeen.

THE ABERDEEN CEMETERY COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—J. Dove Wilson.
ASSESSOR FOR ABERDEEN, Respondent.

Valuation-roll—Cemetery—Yearly value.—Held that one-half of the net profits of a cemetery company was a reasonable sum to take as representing the annual value of the land belonging to the company and used as a cemetery.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Ld. Wellwood.
Ld. Kyllachy.

Case 124.

AT a Valuation Court for the burgh of Aberdeen, held on 12th September 1890, to dispose of appeals against the valuations by the Assessor of the burgh for the year from Whitsunday 1890 to Whitsunday 1891, the Aberdeen Cemetery Company appealed against the Assessor's entry, in which the cemetery was valued at a yearly rent of £297 and the lodge at £13, 10s. The appellants contended that the valuation should be reduced to £171 for the subjects in question.

The Assessor had arrived at the valuation by ascertaining the net profits of the company for the year and entering one-half thereof as the rent which a hypothetical tenant would be likely to pay for the liberty to carry on the business of the company. The value so ascertained the Assessor had allocated between the cemetery and the lodge.

The Magistrates sustained the valuation, and the appellants craved a case, in which the above facts were stated.

Argued for the appellants;—The valuation fell to be reduced, having regard to the recent case of the Craigton Cemetery Company,[1] in which less than one-third of the net profits made by that company was fixed as a reasonable annual value for the purposes of the Valuation Act.

There was no appearance for the Assessor.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I am not prepared to say that half the net profits is not a reasonable rent to take as representing the annual value. No doubt cemeteries are not usually let, but it does seem to me that half the net profits is a sum at which I should expect a tenant to be well content to take the cemetery. I therefore think the Magistrates are right.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates was right.

T. R. GILLIES, Advocate, Aberdeen, Agent for Appellants.

No. 182.

June 13, 1891.†
Bank of Scotland v. Assessor for Edinburgh.

THE GOVERNOR AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Appellants.—Murray—C. J. Guthrie.
ASSESSOR FOR EDINBURGH, Respondent.—Jameson—Boyd.

Valuation-roll—Bank buildings with dwelling-houses occupied by bank officials—Cumulo or separate valuation.—The premises of a bank, including the banking-office and the dwelling-houses of two bank officials, were entered in the Valuation-roll as a unum quid at one cumulo valuation. The bank appealed, and maintained that the offices and dwelling-houses ought to be separately valued in order to satisfy the purposes of a local Act, which, in authorising an assessment, made a distinction between the assessment of dwelling-houses and offices. The houses formed part of the main bank buildings—one of them had internal communication with the office and the other had not.

* Decided Feb. 17, 1891.

[1] Craigton Cemetery Co., Limited, v. Assessor of the Lower Ward of Lanark, Feb. 2, 1889, 16 R. 802.

† Decided March 10, 1891.

No. 182.

June 13, 1891.

Bank of Scotland v. Assessor for Edinburgh.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.

Ld. Wellwood.

Ld. Kyllachy.

Case 117.

Held that the dwelling-house which had no internal communication with the business premises ought to be separately valued, and that the dwelling-house which had such communication ought to be valued along with the office as a unum quid.

(VIDE ante, May 30, 1890, 17 R. 839.)

At an Appeal Court held by the Magistrates of the burgh of Edinburgh on 10th day of September 1890, for the purpose of hearing and disposing of appeals against valuations made by the Assessor for the year from Whitsunday 1891, the Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland appealed against an entry in the Valuation-roll by which the dwelling-houses of two officials of the bank and the office of the bank, which were all in the same building, were entered at a lump sum of £2500.

The appellants did not dispute the correctness of the valuation, but desired that the subjects should be divided according to the purpose for which each part of them was used, and that a separate entry in the Valuation-roll should be made for each part or division, stating the value thereof. The grounds upon which they sought the change in the entry were that it was necessary for the purposes of certain assessments, and in compliance with the provisions of the Act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, that the valuation of the dwelling-houses should be separately entered from the bank-office in the Valuation-roll.

A process of suspension had been raised in the Court of Session at the instance of the Bank of Scotland to determine the question whether the Edinburgh and District Water Trustees were entitled, under their Acts, to levy the full domestic water-rate upon the premises used by the bank for its business. Under the Edinburgh and District Water Trust Acts, the water-rates were assessed and leviable upon the various heritages according to the Valuation-rolls applicable thereto. As the current entries in the Valuation-roll did not contain a separate valuation of (1) the office or business premises occupied by the Bank of Scotland, and (2) the houses owned by the bank and occupied by their cashier and bank-messenger, the suspension was dismissed, leaving it open to the bank to apply for a rectification of the Valuation-roll by entering the business premises and the houses under separate valuations.

The whole subjects of the bank consisted of one block of building separate and detached from any other building. The building was used as follows:—(1) Partly for carrying on the banking business; (2) partly as a dwelling-house for Mr Bell, the cashier, who lived in the upper flats; and (3) partly as a dwelling-house for Mr Lindsay, one of the bank-messengers, who lived in a part of the basement floor. Mr Bell's house was entered by a gate on the east end of the building leading to an outside passage or terrace, and thence by a door into a staircase, which formed the only access to Mr Bell's house for his family and servants. This staircase formed part of the main building, and the connection with the rest of the building was through a door on the first-floor landing, which formed an entrance to the business part of the building, and which was used by Mr Bell in going between his house and the bank, and also by the messenger. The large outside door of the building was closed and opened from the inside, and could not be opened or closed from the outside. The messenger or porter who closed the bank for the night left the bank by the door leading into the stair, which also formed the access to Mr Bell's house, and having handed the keys to Mr Bell, who was custodier thereof, did not enter the bank again, but left by the staircase at the east end of the building. His own dwelling-house on the basement was not connected with the rest of the premises by any internal communication, but was entered by a separate gate at the east end of the building leading down an outside stair to a separate outside door. Mr Bell and Mr Lindsay occupied their houses as officials of the bank, and their occupancy depended upon their remaining so.

No. 182.

June 13, 1891. Bank of Scotland v. Assessor for Edinburgh.

The Assessor referred to Bank of Scotland v. Assessor for Edinburgh, decided May 30, 1890, 17 R. 839, and stated that the question in regard to the messenger's house had been raised in that case; but that the Judges having differed in opinion, the Magistrates' decision was allowed to stand.

The Magistrates adhered to their former decision, and dismissed the appeal.

The appellants craved a case, from which, and from the report in 17 R. 839, to which the parties referred, the above narrative is taken.

The arguments submitted by the parties were the same as those reported on p. 842 of 17 R., and fully appear otherwise from the opinions of the Judges.

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—I remain of the opinion which I expressed last year, namely, that when there is no internal communication between premises occupied as a dwelling-house and adjoining business premises the annual value of the former should be entered separately in the Valuation-roll if this is desired by the proprietor, although both sets of premises form part of the same tenement. For my reasons I refer to the opinion which I delivered last year reported in 17 R. 844. I therefore think that the value of the messenger's house, between which and the bank's business premises there is no internal communication, should be entered separately in the roll.

The cashier's house is in a different position. But for the door of communication between the bank's business premises and the stair leading to the house, I should have held that the value of the house should also be entered separately. But in the present condition of the premises the cashier can enter the bank without going into the street. The internal private stair leading to the cashier's house, which is really part of the house, is used not merely as an access to the house, but also as an access to the bank for the purpose of shutting and opening it, and the cashier himself is the custodier of the keys after bank hours.

It is true that a very slight structural alteration would cut off the bank's business premises altogether from the dwelling-house, and that other arrangements might be made for opening and shutting the bank which would not entail the use of the stair leading to the cashier's house. But I think the safer view is to deal with the premises as they at present stand. I think there is a solid distinction between a dwelling-house which has absolutely no internal communication with the business premises, and one which is connected with them in such a way that access can be obtained from the one to the other without passing into the street or common stair or passage. I therefore think that the value of the cashier's house should not be entered separately in the roll.

LORD KYLLACHY.—The test I think here is whether the houses in question are capable, not merely physically but all conditions being considered, of being separately let, and having a separate rent or value attached to them. As regards the house occupied by the messenger, and which has no internal communication with the rest of the bank, I agree with the opinion of Lord Wellwood at the last Court. I see no reason, at least none appears in the case, why, if the bank chose, this house should not be separately let to a suitable tenant, or assigned by way of pension to an old servant, or otherwise dealt with as a separate and independent dwelling.

No. 182.

June 13, 1891.
Bank of Scotland v. Assessor for Edinburgh.

As regards the other house, the house occupied by the cashier, I think there is room to distinguish. There is here an internal communication, and that being the case, I see no reason for differing from the judgment of last year, in which judgment both my brethren concurred.

I am therefore of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates is wrong as regards the messenger's house, and right as regards that of the cashier.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates was wrong in the case of the messenger's house, and right in the case of the cashier's house.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 183.

June 13, 1891.*
M'Farlane and Dailly v. Assessor for Dundee.

WILLIAM M'FARLANE, Appellant.—W. L. Mackenzie.
DANIEL DAILLY, Appellant.—R. V. Campbell—Law.
ASSESSOR FOR DUNDEE, Respondent.—Party.

Valuation-roll—Public-house—Goodwill—Consideration other than rent.—The proprietor and occupier of a public-house having died intestate leaving a son and daughter, both in minority, his law-agents acting generally in the interests of the heir and executor, accepted an offer of £660 for the goodwill of the business, shop fittings, &c., made on condition of the offerer obtaining a transfer of the licence, and a five years' lease of the premises at £80 per annum. The rent of £80 was a full rent for the premises when used as a licensed public-house, the value of the premises without the licence being about £30. The value of the shop-fittings, &c., was £150. The £510 paid for goodwill had not been apportioned between the heir and the executor, and there was no evidence that any part of it belonged to the heir.

Held that as it had not been proved that any part of the £510 belonged to the heir the latter sum could not be regarded as a consideration other than the rent stipulated for in the lease, and that therefore the premises fell to be valued at £80.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Ld. Wellwood.
Ld. Kyllachy.

WILLIAM M'FARLANE, proprietor of a shop in Lochee Road, Dundee, carried on a spirit business in the premises, and died intestate in 1889, leaving a son and daughter in minority.

Messrs Shield & Kyd, who acted as law-agents for the family, advertised the business for sale as a going concern.

Case 122.

On 29th October 1889 Daniel Dailly junior made an offer of the sum of £660 sterling for goodwill, fittings, and utensils, on condition (1) that a transfer of the licence "should be obtained at the first Court"; and (2) that a five years' lease should be granted at £80 per annum.

This offer was on 19th November accepted by Messrs Shield & Kyd, who explained to the offerer that the lease would be "granted by the heir to the property, who is in minority."

On 5th December William M'Farlane in terms of this acceptance granted the lease in Dailly's favour at a rent of £80.

The Assessor entered the premises for the year ending Whitsunday 1891 at a sum of £172. He refused to hold the lease as fixing the yearly rent or value of the subjects. He was of opinion that the sum paid for goodwill, £660, less £150 taken by him as the fair value of the fittings, &c. included in the purchase, fell to be spread over the years of the lease, and added to the rent in the lease.

M'Farlane and Dailly appealed against the entry at a Valuation Court for the city and burgh of Dundee held on 12th and 19th September 1890.

The appellants maintained that the valuation should be reduced to £80

* Decided March 10, 1891.

No. 183.

June 13, 1891. M'Farlane and Dailly v. Assessor for Dundee.

(1) as the rent payable under the lease; or (2) as the proved annual value of the subjects.

They led evidence, from which the following facts appeared. The subjects, apart from the spirit licence, were worth from £25 to £30 a-year, and with the spirit licence might fairly be valued at £80. From 1881 the rent had stood in the Valuation-roll at from £70 to £80, and for the year 1889-90 at £70. It was admitted that the Assessor's valuation was greatly in excess of any valuation which had been put upon similar premises in the neighbourhood. The sum paid for goodwill, while not included in the confirmation of the executry, had not been paid to the heir in the heritage, but remained in the hands of the law-agents acting for both of the minors.

The Magistrates, by a bare majority, sustained the Assessor's valuation.

M'Farlane and Dailly obtained a case, in which the above facts were stated.

Argued for the appellants;—The case of Drummond[1] should not be followed. The sum paid as goodwill was paid in order to gain an entrance into the trade. It was of a personal nature, and formed no part of the landlord's heritable estate. No part of it had been paid to the heir. The landlord was not accepting a lower rent in respect of the sum paid for goodwill. It was proved that the subjects, apart from the goodwill, were worth about £30 a-year, and he now got £80, which had been the valuation of the premises since 1882.[2]

Argued for the Assessor;—The sum paid for goodwill was to be considered as a consideration other than the rent, and fell to be taken into account in fixing the value of the premises.[3]

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—This is an exceptional case, and one not likely to occur again. The late Mr M'Farlane, the father of the appellant William M'Farlane, carried on a spirit business for several years prior to his death in a shop in Lochee Road, Dundee, he being the proprietor of the premises. He died in the course of the year 1889 intestate, leaving a son and daughter, both minors. His agents at the date of his death were Messrs Shield & Kyd, Dundee. It was plain that in the interests both of heir and executor it was desirable that the business at Lochee Road should be sold as a going concern. Accordingly, Messrs Shield & Kyd, acting for the family, or rather taking them into their own hands without distinguishing specially between the interests of heir and executor, advertised the business for sale as a going concern; and in the end the appellant Dailly made an offer of the sum of £660 sterling for goodwill, fittings, and utensils, on condition (1) that a transfer of the licence be obtained at the first Court, and (2) that a five years' lease should be granted at £80 per annum. This offer was accepted by Messrs Shield & Kyd, who explained to the offerer that the lease would be "granted by the heir to the property, who is in minority."

Messrs Shield & Kyd accordingly arranged with William M'Farlane, the heir, to grant a lease at a rent of £80, which he did. The question for our decision is, whether the rent in the lease is to be taken as the annual value of the subjects.

---

[1] Drummond v. Assessor for Leith, Feb. 5, 1886, 13 R. 540.

[2] Nicolson and others v. Assessor for Port-Glasgow, March 12, 1886, 23 S. L. R. 603; Bell's Trustees v. Bell, &c., Nov. 8, 1884, 12 R. 85.

[3] Assessor for Kilmarnock v. Allan, March 9, 1887, 14 R. 581; Assessor for Kilmarnock v. M'Nally, March 9, 1887, 14 R. 582; Drummond v. Assessor for Leith, vide supra, note 1.

No. 183.

June 13, 1891.
M'Farlane and Dailly v. Assessor for Dundee.

I am not much surprised at the Magistrates being very closely divided in opinion. The difficulty arises from so large a sum in name of goodwill having been given. The bare majority of the Magistrates have accepted the view that the whole of the sum to be imputed to goodwill, viz., £510, is to be held as increased rent belonging to the heir. I think that this view is plainly erroneous, because the goodwill of the business was certainly not wholly connected with the premises. It was undoubtedly, at least to some extent, of a personal character, and without the consent of the executor's factor the licence probably could not have been transferred. As confirming this view I may point to the admission that the valuation of £172 per annum brought out on the footing of the whole sum of goodwill being spread over the years of the lease is greatly in excess of any valuation which has been put on similar premises in the neighbourhood, and more than double the previous valuation of the property in question.

As yet the sum of £510 has not been apportioned between heir and executor, and all that is certain is that the heir gets a rent of £80 a-year. Now, it is proved by the evidence that £80 a-year was, prior to the death of the minor's father, a full valuation of the premises when used as a licensed house. It is certain that in letting the premises for a rent of £80 the present proprietor gets an enhanced return of £50 a-year for the premises, and that the rent stipulated for is a full and fair rent for which the premises might be expected to let from year to year as a licensed house if the sum paid for goodwill were left out of view. In this respect the case differs from previous cases in which clearly a lower rent was accepted in respect of a sum paid for goodwill. There is also this difference, that in those cases one and the same person got both the sum paid for goodwill and the rent.

Now, there is no evidence that any part of the £510 has been paid to the heir or belongs to him. It is possible that it may be ultimately held to belong entirely to the executor, the heir having already received an enhanced rent for the premises in respect of the business having been sold as a going concern.

I therefore propose, at least for this year, that the premises should be entered at the rent named in the lease. If eventually it is decided that part of the £510 is to be paid to the heir, we shall have to consider whether an addition should be made to the valuation, and if so, to what extent and in what manner.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates was wrong, and that the rent stated in the lease should be entered.

WYLIE, ROBERTSON, & RANKIN, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 184.

June 13, 1891.*
Duke of Fife v. Assessor for County of Elgin.

THE DUKE OF FIFE, Appellant.—Jameson—Dickson.
ASSESSOR FOR THE COUNTY OF ELGIN, Respondent.—Party.

Valuation-roll—Lease—Meliorations—Sum paid by incoming to outgoing tenants—Consideration other than rent.—The incoming tenant of a farm let to him for nineteen years at a rent of £500 paid to the outgoing tenants a sum of money for meliorations payable to them by the landlord under the expiring lease. His lease contained the stipulation that he should be entitled at its termination to repayment from the landlord of the sum so paid by him, or of such other sum not exceeding it, as the meliorations should then be valued at.

* Decided March 10, 1891.

No. 184.

June 18, 1891.
Duke of Fife v. Assessor for County of Elgin.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Ld. Wellwood.
Ld. Kyllachy.

Case 119.

Held that as the payment by the tenant relieved his landlord of an obligation which he would otherwise have had to meet, there was a consideration other than the rent, and that a sum equivalent to four per cent on it fell to be added to the rent contained in the lease.

A LEASE was entered into by the Duke of Fife with William Rose and James Black of the farms of Sheriffston and Foresterseat, in the parish of St Andrews and county of Elgin, in which it was provided that at its termination the outgoing tenants were to be entitled to repayment from the Duke or the incoming tenant of the value of certain houses and buildings on the farm, and of other meliorations made thereon according to valuation.

The lease having expired at Whitsunday 1882, the Duke let the farms to James Black, one of the joint tenants in the previous lease. The lease was for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1882, at the yearly rent of £500, "in consideration of the rent and other prestations hereinafter mentioned," and of the prestations, &c. contained in the relative regulations and conditions of let of the farms on the estate.

The lease contained the following stipulation;—"In respect the said James Black, at his entry to said farms under this lease, paid the outgoing tenants the sum of £1044, 15s. sterling, as meliorations payable to them under the then expiring leases of said farms, being £700 on buildings on Sheriffston, £300 for buildings on Foresterseat, and £44, 15s. for metal pipes for conveying the water to the mill-dam at Sheriffston, it is hereby provided and agreed that, at the expiry of this lease, the said James Black and his foresaids will be entitled to repayment from the said Earl of Fife and his foresaids, or the then incoming tenant to the farms, of the said sum of £1044, 15s., or such sum, not exceeding that amount, as the buildings on the said farms and the said water-pipes shall then be valued for, in terms of the clause of arbitration in the foresaid regulations and conditions, after allowing a sum of £1006, 7s. 8d. as heritors' valuation (less a fair sum to be deducted for tear and wear on the buildings representing the said sum of £1006, 7s. 8d.) as a first charge thereon, said sum of £1006, 7s. 8d. being composed of £206, 7s. 8d. expended by the said Earl of Fife on buildings on the said farms under the previous lease, £500 expended by him under this lease, and £300 expended by the said James Black, for which he was and is to receive no compensation."

The Assessor for the county of Elgin entered the farms at a yearly rent of £556, 15s.

He arrived at this valuation by adding to the rent of £500 (1) the interest of £300 which the tenant had expended without any claim for compensation, and (2) a sum equivalent to 4 per cent on the sum paid by the tenant for meliorations to his predecessors.

The Duke appealed against this valuation at a Court of the Committee of the County Council of Elgin, held on 12th and 18th September 1890, and contended that the proper rent to be entered in the Valuation-roll was £515, being the rent stipulated in the lease, plus £15 as the interest of the £300 already expended by the tenant, and for which the latter was to receive no compensation.

The Valuation Committee were unanimously of opinion that in respect the tenant had paid to his predecessors in the farm a sum of £1044, 15s. for meliorations, for which, under the lease, he was entitled to repayment from the proprietor at its expiry of the value of the said meliorations at that time, but not exceeding the sum of £1044, 15s., the Assessor was entitled to put an additional value upon the farm over and above the rent stipulated in the lease. The Committee accordingly sustained the Assessor's valuation.

The Duke craved a case, in which the above facts were stated.

No. 184.
June 13, 1891.
Duke of Fife v. Assessor for County of Elgin.

Argued for the appellant;—All the present benefit enjoyed by him was the actual rent stipulated in the lease, plus the benefit of the expenditure of £300 by the tenant. Any beneficial interest competent to him as proprietor in the meliorations in question could only emerge at the termination of the lease, and even then he would have to pay for them. They clearly did not form a consideration other than the rent.[1]

The Assessor was not called upon.

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—In this case I am of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee is right. Under the previous lease in favour of William Rose and James Black, which terminated at Whitsunday 1882, the outgoing tenants were entitled to repayment from the proprietor or incoming tenant of the value of certain houses and buildings on the farm, and certain other meliorations made thereon, as the same should be valued at the termination of the lease.

The noble appellant let the farm to James Black, one of the joint tenants, under the previous lease, for nineteen years, from Whitsunday 1882, "in consideration of the rent and other prestations hereinafter mentioned," and of the prestations, &c., contained in relative regulations and conditions of let of the farms on the Fife estate. The lease contains the stipulation which is quoted in the case.

Now, on the termination of the former lease, either of two courses was open to the proprietor. He might settle with the outgoing tenants by paying them the value of the buildings and meliorations himself, or he might do so by arranging with the incoming tenant that the latter should pay for them. He preferred to adopt the latter course, and accordingly Black paid the outgoing tenants £1044, 15s. as meliorations payable to them, that sum being made up, as we see, to the extent of £1000 for buildings on Sheriffston and Foresterseat, and £44, 15s. for metal pipes. The question is, whether that payment by the incoming tenant was not a consideration other than rent in the sense of the sixth section of the statute. I am of opinion that it was. The proprietor was thereby relieved of an onerous obligation—repayment of an outlay necessary to make the subjects lettable during the currency of that lease, and it is to be presumed that the tenant got the lease at a smaller rent than he would have had to pay if the landlord had settled with the outgoing tenants himself. This much is clear. The buildings were on the ground at the beginning of the lease, and the subjects as they then stood were worth annually more than a rent of £500, because the tenant found it worth his while not only to pay an annual rent of £500, but to make an immediate outlay of £1044, 15s., which otherwise the landlord would have had to provide. The rent in the lease was therefore not a yearly rent conditioned as the fair annual value of the subject without other consideration.

It is true that at the expiry of the lease the tenant will be repaid the then value of the buildings and meliorations, but this does not, I think, affect the question before us, which is, Did the proprietor, before granting, and as a condition of granting the lease, stipulate for and receive a consideration other than the rent? The answer to that is, that he did receive a present consideration in that he was relieved during the currency of the lease of making an outlay of £1044, 15s.

[1] Martin v. Assessor for Burgh of Leith, June 14, 1889, 16 R. 799; North British Railway Co. v. Assessor for Glasgow, March 12, 1890, 17 R. 846; Trustees of Dundee Harbour, &c. v. Assessor for Dundee, March 19, 1886, 13 R. 829.

No. 184.

June 13, 1891. Duke of Fife v. Assessor for County of Elgin.

The cases relied on by the appellant are clearly distinguishable. In Stewart's Factor v. The Assessor for Leith, 16 R. 799, case No. 95, the tenant was, no doubt, bound to erect a circus on the ground, but this, the Judges held, was simply in order to give an additional security for the rent. Instead of it being declared that the building was to become the property of the landlord, it was provided that the tenant should be entitled to remove it at the termination of the lease.

In the other case—The North British Railway Company v. The Assessor for Glasgow, 17 R. 846, case No. 108—the tenant was not taken bound to erect any buildings, but he was given liberty to do so, the landlord being at liberty to acquire such buildings, if erected, at a valuation at the expiry of the lease. The landlord thus got no benefit or consideration other than rent.

I do not think that these cases have any application here.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

J. K. & W. P. LINDSAY, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 185.

June 13, 1891.* Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Assessor for County of Fife.

THE COWDENBEATH COAL COMPANY, Appellants.—Jameson—Salvesen.
ASSESSOR FOR COUNTY OF FIFE, Respondent.—Constable.

Valuation-roll—Lease—Agreement—Dwelling-houses in connection with colliery—Consideration other than rent.—During the currency of a mineral lease for thirty-one years, under which the rent payable by the tenants was a royalty on the output of coal, the landlord and tenants entered into an agreement with a view to extend the mineral workings, under which the tenants were to erect certain additional miners' houses upon the lands belonging to the landlord, but then let to an agricultural tenant. The mineral tenants were to be entitled to repay themselves the cost of erection by retaining the royalties over and above a certain sum per annum, on condition of erecting an equal number and value of houses on ground belonging to themselves. The houses on the landlord's property were to be maintained and insured against fire by the tenants, who were also to settle the claims of the agricultural tenant for the land taken for the houses, and to relieve the landlord of certain assessments. At the termination of the lease the houses, so far as paid for out of the royalties, were to be left to the landlord, and quoad ultra he was to have the right to take them over at a valuation, and failing his doing so the tenants were to be entitled to remove the materials. Houses were erected on the landlord's lands under this agreement, and were in the occupation of miners, who paid a rent to the tenants. The Assessor entered them at that rent as the property of the tenants.

The Court held that the entry was wrong, being of opinion (1) that the agreement fell to be read as part of the lease; (2) that it contained no consideration other than the rent, with the exception of the sum paid for insurance; and therefore (3) that with the exception of the latter sum the subjects were covered by the royalty payable under the mineral lease.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. Ld. Wellwood. Ld. Kyllachy.

Case 120.

THE COWDENBEATH COAL COMPANY were tenants under the Earl of Zetland of his Lumphinnans minerals in the county of Fife, which with certain miners' and other houses, sixty-six in number, were let to the company under lease dated 2d August 1881, for thirty-one years from Martinmas 1883. The company were entered in the Valuation-roll as tenants under this lease at an annual value of £2526, 3s. 10d.

* Decided March 10, 1891.

No. 185.

June 13, 1891
Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Assessor for County of Fife.

In March 1886 the company entered into an agreement* with his Lordship for providing additional workmen's houses to enable the company further to develop the mineral workings on Lumphinnans under the lease.

In pursuance of this agreement, the company erected 130 miners' houses, of which fifty-four were on land belonging to Lord Zetland, of which the company obtained a sublease from his agricultural tenant at a rent of £36, 10s. 2d., and seventy-six on land belonging absolutely to the company. The surplus royalty retained by the company under this agreement in respect of the fifty-four houses amounted at the date of the appeal to £526, 3s. 10d.

The Assessor for the county of Fife entered the fifty-four houses which had been built upon Lord Zetland's lands in the Valuation-roll as the property of the company at £258, the rents payable to the company by the miners occupying them respectively, and £6 for houses unlet.

The Valuation Committee having confirmed the Assessor's entry, the company appealed.

The case set forth the facts above stated.

---

* The agreement provided,—"The second parties (the tenants) having applied to the said Earl to co-operate with them in providing additional workmen's houses, for enabling them to develop the working of the minerals in his estate of Lumphinnans . . . have agreed and hereby agree to the following conditions, namely :—

"First, One-half of the additional houses required from time to time shall be erected by the second parties on the said Earl's lands of Lumphinnans. . . .

"Second, The other half of the additional houses so required shall be erected by the second parties upon such parts of the ground belonging to themselves in the vicinity as shall be approved of by the first parties.

"Third, Upon an equal number and value of houses being erected as aforesaid on ground belonging to the said Earl and the second parties respectively . . . the said second parties shall be entitled to retain any excess over the sum of £2000 per annum of royalty rents payable by them under the foresaid lease after the last date hereof (after deducting the rebate of ten per cent to which they are entitled), which excess shall be applied towards repayment of the cost of the houses referred to in article first hereof, including drainage and fencing, but declaring that the total amount to be repaid to them shall not exceed the sum of £2100, with interest at the rate of five per cent from the dates of outlay.

"Fourth, The whole of the houses referred to in articles first and second shall be upheld by the second parties in good repair during the remainder of the foresaid lease. . . .

"Fifth, It shall be optional to the landlord at the end of the said lease to take over any of the houses referred to in article first of which the cost shall not have been repaid by him as aforesaid, and that at a valuation by two arbiters. . . . If not so taken over, the second parties shall have power at the termination of the said lease to remove the materials of the said houses. . . .

"Sixth, It shall also be optional to the landlord, at the termination of the said lease, to take over the houses referred to in article second, and any ground attached thereto, at a valuation as aforesaid, such valuation including the price to be paid for the site of the said houses and the ground attached thereto. . . .

"Seventh, The second parties oblige themselves to settle the claims of the tenant of Lumphinnans Farm for the land occupied by the houses referred to in article first, and any ground attached thereto for gardens or otherwise, and that yearly at the term of Martinmas; also to keep the whole of the houses to be erected by them as aforesaid insured against fire to the amount of two-thirds of the cost thereof, and to relieve the landlord of any assessments that may be imposed upon him for water supply or drainage for the houses referred to in article first hereof."

No. 185.

June 13, 1891. Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Assessor for County of Fife.

The appellants stated;—"The payments which the appellants have to make in respect of the houses in question under the seventh head of the agreement are as follows:—

1. Farm tenant's claim for land occupied, . .	£2 16 10
2. Insurance, ...	1 17 6
3. There is no assessment for water, but the proportion of the cost of the water for all the houses is about, ...	3 0 0
	£7 14 4"

Argued for the company;—(1) The agreement under which the houses were built was nothing more than a modification of the lease. There was no distinction between houses built under it, and houses which had been on the ground at the beginning of the lease. Both sets of houses must be held to be included in the valuation of the colliery.[1] (2) There were no considerations other than the royalty bargained for. In the case of Wm. Dixon,[2] there was an independent consideration in respect of buildings which the stipulated royalties were not intended to cover.

Argued for the respondent;—The houses in question were not mere accessories to the working of the minerals, but formed separate lettable subjects. Assuming, however, that they were to be regarded as merely accessory,—(1) They were erected under the agreement, which was entirely distinct from the lease, and could not be held to fall under it. (2) Even although it were held that the lease and the agreement fell to be read together, the houses could not be regarded as mineral subjects, and accordingly, as the lease was for thirty-one years, they fell, in terms of section 5 of the Valuation Act, to be valued apart from all stipulated rent. (3) In any case there were stipulations under the agreement which amounted in terms of the Act to a "consideration other than the rent," and which excluded the houses from the subjects in respect of which a royalty was payable under the lease.[3] (a) There was an obligation upon the tenants to erect houses on their own land equal in value to those erected on the landlord's. No doubt the latter received a certain amount of benefit from their erection; but so long as there was an independent prestable obligation undertaken by the tenant, it did not matter that the landlord was also benefited.[4] The houses erected by the tenants on their own and on the landlord's property were in exactly the same position, the latter not having been nearly paid for, and the appellants had made no objection to the former being entered in the Valuation-roll. (b) There was an obligation to compensate the agricultural tenant.[5] (c) There were obligations to maintain and insure the buildings.[6] (d) There was a right of pre-emption to the landlord, and (e) an obligation on the tenants to relieve the landlord of certain assessments. It did not matter that the pecuniary value of

---

[1] Coltness Iron Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Linlithgowshire, March 1, 1882, 10 R. 21; Leadhills Silver Lead Mining and Smelting Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Lanarkshire, March 19, 1886, 13 R. 827.

[2] Wm. Dixon, Limited, v. Assessor for Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, Feb. 6, 1885, 12 R. 639.

[3] Trustees of Dundee Harbour, &c. v. Assessor for Dundee, March 19, 1886, 13 R. 829, per Lord Fraser, pp. 831 and 832.

[4] Trustees of Dundee Harbour, &c. v. Assessor for Dundee, vide supra, note 3.

[5] Drumgray Coal Co., April 8, 1867, 11 Macph. 977; Dalmeny Oil Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Linlithgowshire, Feb. 9, 1884, 11 R. 566.

[6] Patrick v. Assessor for Renfrewshire, March 12, 1890, 17 R. 854.

No. 185.

June 13, 1891.
Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Assessor for County of Fife.

the obligations undertaken by the tenants was much less than the rent of the subjects.[1]

At advising,—

LORD KYLLACHY.—There are two questions which are involved in this appeal. The first is, whether the agreement of 3d March 1886, under which the houses in question were built and were possessed, is a separate and independent agreement, constituting in effect a lease of land for a period over twenty-one years; or whether, on the other hand, it is a mere supplement to the original mineral lease dated in 1881, and is to be read as if its provisions were incorporated with that lease, and had all along formed a part of its stipulations.

We heard a very able argument from Mr Constable in support of the first of those views, which is the view maintained by the Assessor; but I have come, although with some difficulty, to the conclusion that the second view is the sound one. I think on its fair construction that the agreement must be read as part of the original lease.

This, however, raises the second question, upon which we also heard argument, viz., whether reading the mineral lease and the agreement together, the landlord did not receive considerations in respect of these houses other than the rent and royalty payable under the lease. Reference was made to various provisions and stipulations which were said to confer benefits on the landlord, and to be equivalent to an increased rent. But on this matter I have come to be satisfied that neither the lease nor the agreement contains any provision in favour of the landlord which is of an unusual description, or goes beyond the fair and ordinary conditions of such a lease. The only exception is as to the insurance, which appears to be only £1, 17s. 6d. per annum, and which in strictness ought to be added to the cumulo royalty. It was suggested that the farm tenant's claim for land occupied and the proportion of the cost of the water were in the same position; but it seems to me that neither of these are payments which can be regarded as payments on behalf of the landlord, or as involving any separate consideration to him.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee is wrong, and that the whole subjects are covered by the rent payable under the mineral lease, with the exception of the £1, 17s. 6d. of insurance to which I have referred.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I agree with Lord Kyllachy that under the agreement of 3d March 1886 the landlord does not get any further consideration in respect of the houses to be erected by the tenants, unless it be the trifling sum paid annually for insurance. The agreement is really supplementary to the original lease, and was entered into on the application of the tenants for the purpose of enabling them to develop the minerals let to them. Under the original lease the return to the landlord was a minimum rent of £1000, or, alternatively, certain lordships. If the erection of an additional number of workmen's houses leads to a larger output, the landlord will get the immediate benefit of that in the shape of increased return in royalties, and the annual value of his property will be increased in proportion. But, so far as I see, that will be all the additional consideration he will get.

[1] Wm. Dixon, Limited, v. Assessor for Lanarkshire, May 17, 1884, 11 R. 844, and Feb. 6, 1885, 12 R. 639; Trustees of Dundee Harbour, &c. v. Assessor for Dundee, vide supra, p. 946, note 3.

No. 185.

June 13, 1891. Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Assessor for County of Fife.

The agreement is not, properly speaking, a lease at all. It gives liberty to the tenants to build additional houses, provided they can settle with the agricultural tenant, to whom apparently the surface of the land was already let. The agreement contains a variety of stipulations partly in favour of the tenants and partly in favour of the landlord; but I think they balance as nearly as possible, and that their object, so far as the landlord is concerned, is that he should be kept free from expense during the currency of the mineral lease. No doubt the buildings are to become his property if he chooses, but then he is to pay for them either out of the surplus royalties or at a valuation at the close of the lease. But he does not stipulate for any rent or other consideration which can fairly be held to come in place of rent.

In this respect the case, I think, differs from the case of William Dixon, Limited, 11 R. 844, and 12 R. 639. In that case the buildings in question were in existence at the beginning of the lease, and the Judges held, on a consideration of the terms of the lease, that the royalties stipulated for were not intended to cover the buildings, but that the landlord bargained for separate considerations in respect of them. In the present case the rent under the original lease undoubtedly covers the houses existing at its commencement, and I think, on a sound construction of the agreement of 3d March 1886, the landlord does not bargain for and will not receive any additional consideration beyond increased return in the shape of royalties.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was wrong.

BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—J. BROWN, Assessor for Fifeshire—Agents.

No. 186.

June 13, 1891.* Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Assessor for County of Fife.

THE COWDENBEATH COAL COMPANY, Appellants.—Jameson—Salvesen. ASSESSOR FOR COUNTY OF FIFE, Respondent.—Constable.

Valuation-roll—Sublease.—Where subjects are sublet, the only rent which ought to appear in the Valuation-roll under the heading "Yearly rent or value" is the rent paid by the principal tenant to the owner. The occupier's column may, however, contain in addition to the name of the principal tenant that of the subtenant, with the rent paid by him and the extent of his occupation.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. Ld. Wellwood. Ld. Kyllachy.

Case 121.

THE COWDENBEATH COAL COMPANY appealed to the Valuation Committee of the County Council of Fifeshire against the following entry in the Valuation-roll:—

Description and Situation of Subject.	Proprietor.	Tenant.	Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.
Field of Lumphinnans Farm.	The Right Hon. Lawrence Dundas, Earl of Zetland.	Hugh Stewart, farmer.	Cowdenbeath Coal Company.	£36 10 ?

The field in question was a twenty-two acre field, which had been sublet to the company by Mr Stewart, the tenant of the farm of Lumphinnans, in order that they might erect miners' houses.

* Decided March 10, 1891.

No. 186.

June 13, 1891. Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Assessor for County of Fife.

The Assessor stated that the rent of the entire Lumphinnans farm, as leased by Mr Stewart, was £515, 10s. 6d. In respect that the field in question had been sublet to the company at a rent of £36, 10s. 2d., Stewart was entered in the roll at the sum of £479, 0s. 4d. and the company were entered as occupiers of the field at £36, 10s. 2d.

The Valuation Committee confirmed the entry, and the company craved a case, in which the above facts appeared.

Argued for the appellants;—The rent which ought to enter the roll was the rent in Stewart's lease. The appellants were subtenants only, and ought not to appear in the roll at all.[1]

Argued for the Assessor;—The purpose of the roll was to shew the actual circumstances existing. The statutory form of the roll contained a column shewing not only the "tenant," but the "occupier" of the various descriptions of property.

LORD KYLLACHY.—We are of opinion that the only rent which ought to appear in the Valuation-roll under the heading or column "yearly rent or value" is the rent paid by the principal tenant, that being the rent receivable by the owner, and the only rent which the Valuation Acts recognise.

It is, however, in our opinion quite proper that the whole subject being entered at its proper value, the occupier's column of the roll should contain the names both of the agricultural tenant and of the Cowdenbeath Coal Company, who now divide between them the occupation of the subject; and we see no harm in recording in the same column, if that is desired, the extent of the company's occupation and also the subrent which they pay.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee is wrong.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I agree. I think the matter is settled by decision, in particular Hay, 11 Macph. 981, and Lawson's Representatives v. Assessor for Edinburgh, 10 R. 633.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was wrong.

BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—J. BROWN, Assessor for Fifeshire—Agents.

No. 187.

June 16, 1891. Middle Ward of Lanarkshire Trustees v. Lord Belhaven's Trustee.

ROAD TRUSTEES OF THE COUNTY OF THE MIDDLE WARD OF LANARK, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—C. J. Guthrie—Dykes.
GEORGE AULDJO JAMIESON (Lord Belhaven's Trustee), Defender (Respondent).—Dickson—Dundas.

Road—Road Trustees—Powers—Level-crossing—Removal.—Held that when road trustees have sanctioned the formation of a railway level-crossing over one of their roads they are not entitled arbitrarily to demand its removal or to impose unreasonable conditions upon its continuance.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. C.

BY minute, dated 11th September 1841, the Statute Labour Road Trustees of the parish of Cambusnethan granted permission to Lord Belhaven to form a railway level-crossing over a road in the burgh of Wishaw known as the Manse Road, and the level-crossing was made accordingly.

On 26th November 1889 the County Road Trustees of the county of the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, as in right of the Statute Labour Road

[1] Hay & Co., July 12, 1869, 11 Macph. 981; Lawson's Representatives v. Assessor for Edinburgh, Feb. 24, 1883, 10 R. 663; Riley v. Webster & Borland, Jan. 25, 1883, 20 S. L. R. 321.

No. 187.

June 16, 1891. Middle Ward of Lanarkshire Trustees v. Lord Belhaven's Trustee.

Trustees, brought an action against Mr George Auldjo Jamieson, the trustee under a trust-disposition granted by the late Lord Belhaven, for decree ordaining the defender to remove the level-crossing, or alternatively to grant a bond binding himself to observe certain conditions for the maintenance and protection of the road, and of the persons using it.*

The pursuers averred that since the formation of the crossing the volume of railway traffic over it had increased to such an extent that the safety of the public, for which the pursuers were responsible, was much endangered.

The defender denied that the safety of the public was to any extent endangered, and averred that his tenants used the crossing with every reasonable and suitable care and precaution, and that it was not dangerous.

The pursuers pleaded;—2. Separatim, The pursuers are entitled to have the crossing removed, as being in their opinion dangerous to the public safety. 3. The said level-crossing having been formed for the use and benefit of the defender upon a road under the control and management of the pursuers, and for the safety of which the pursuers are responsible, the pursuers are entitled to impose such regulations and conditions on the continued use thereof as they may deem reasonable and proper in the discharge of their duty.

The defender pleaded;—3. The defender being under no obligation to remove the said crossing or to grant the said bond, should be assoilzied.

* The following were the conditions and regulations contained in the bond:—(First) To maintain the level-crossing at his own expense, at the sight of and to the satisfaction of the said County Road Trustees or of their surveyor. . . . (Second) To erect and maintain sufficient gates in the line of the fences on each side of the road, which were to be kept constantly closed across the railway except during the time when trains passing along the railway should have to cross the road. "(Third) Not to allow at any time any train, carriage, or engine to stand across the road; and in shunting trains not to pass any train over the crossing. (Fourth) Not to permit any carriage to pass over the crossing unless the same is attached to a locomotive engine. (Fifth) The said level-crossing shall be used so as to cause the least possible interruption or delay to the traffic upon the road. (Sixth) Not to allow the crossing to be used by or on behalf of any person or persons other than the granter hereof, and his successors and their tenants, without the consent of the said board. (Seventh) To free, relieve, and skaithless keep the said County Road Board and the County Road Trustees and each of the said trustees individually, from all loss, damages, penalties, or others which the said board or the said trustees or any of them may suffer or incur by or through the use or existence of the said level-crossing: As also to free and relieve the said board and the said trustees or any of them from all claims which the public or any individual or individuals may make against the said board or trustees or trustee in consequence of any accident, injury, or loss which may arise or be sustained from the said level-crossing or the use thereof, or from any steam-engine or engines, or truck, waggon, or other carriage or carriages employed on the said level-crossing, or from steam emitted from engines, or from noise arising from the use or working of the said level-crossing, or from any cause whatever in connection with said level-crossing or the use thereof, and of all expenses which the said board or trustees or trustee may incur in defending themselves from such claims: As also, on intimation being made to him that notice of such a claim has been made against the said board or against the said trustees, or any of them, he shall be bound, as he hereby binds and obliges himself and his successors, to free and relieve the said board or trustees or trustee, not only of the claim itself and of its consequents, but also of the settlement or adjustment thereof, which he shall himself carry through. (Eighth) To warrant, as he hereby binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to warrant, these presents to the said County Road Board and to the said trustees, and each of them, at all hands and against all mortals, as law will."

No. 187.

June 16, 1891.
Middle Ward of Lanarkshire Trustees v. Lord Belhaven's Trustee.

4. The defender being entitled at common law to cross the said road by the said railway or otherwise for the proper working of his said minerals and cultivation and management of his said lands, situated on both sides of said road, ought to be assoilzied. 5. The pursuers are barred from demanding the removal of the crossing—(1) In respect of the said minute dated 11th September 1841, and rei interventus following thereon; and (2) in respect that for more than the period of the long prescription the passage of the public over the defender's said lands has been subject to the use by his said tenants of the said level crossing. 6. The said crossing being necessary for the proper working of the defender's minerals and management of his lands, and not being dangerous to the public, ought not to be removed.

A proof before answer was allowed.

It was proved that the private railway which crossed the Manse Road was originally a horse-railway, but that since 1866 or 1867 the traction had been effected by locomotives. The existence of the crossing was proved to be essential to the working of the mineral traffic in the district. Although the pursuers led evidence to shew that it was essential to the public safety (1) that certain upstanding levers which regulated the points should be removed, and (2) that there should be gates which could be closed against public traffic when engines were passing over the crossing, it was proved that no accident had ever happened there. It was also proved that the traffic upon the road (which was not a main thoroughfare) was small, and was tending to grow less.

In the course of the proof the defender tendered the minute quoted below.*

On 20th February 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) dismissed the action.†

---

* In the minute the defender stated that he "had all along been willing, and hereby offered—1. To erect suitable gates at the level-crossing mentioned on record, so that the said road may be closed to public traffic while engines or waggons are passing over the said crossing, and to remove from off the said road the lever and the points which are alleged to exist on the road at said crossing. 2. To grant a bond to the pursuers, undertaking to relieve them of all responsibility for or claims in regard to damage caused by the existence of the said crossing on the road, as distinguished from its use. 3. That the defender's tenants, or others making use of the rails upon said level-crossing, shall grant to the pursuers bonds binding them severally to relieve the pursuers of all responsibility for or claims in regard to damage caused by the working of traffic upon said crossing, the owner of the engine of any train causing such damage being liable therefor; and 4. That any future tenant or other person deriving right from the defender to use said crossing shall be taken bound to grant a bond or bonds in the terms specified in the preceding article."

† "OPINION.—The pursuers here seek to enforce the removal by the defender of a certain railway-crossing formed upon a road known as the 'Manse Road,' in the outskirts of Wishaw; or, alternatively, they seek to have the defender ordained to grant a certain bond, the terms of which are recited in the condescendence. The parties not being at one as to the history of the crossing and the circumstances which have led up to the dispute, I some time ago allowed a proof before answer; and that proof having now been taken, and the pursuers having declined to accept the terms offered by the defender in the course of the proof, and now embodied in the minute No. 93 of process, I have to decide the question at issue—a question which, as it seems to me, should never have arisen, and which is now at least reduced to a point so fine that (apart from the question of expenses) I can scarcely conceive how, as between two such parties, it comes to be litigated.

"The crossing in dispute was sanctioned, by minute of the Road Trustees of the day, on the application of the defender's author in the year 1841, and it

No. 187.

June 16, 1891. Middle Ward of Lanarkshire Trustees v. Lord Belhaven's Trustee.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—1. They were entitled without reason assigned to order the removal of the level crossing when they has been in use ever since by the defender's tenants, forming part of a private line of railway which is the usual means of communication between various important works and the Caledonian Railway. This private railway, up to 1866 or 1867, was a horse-railway. Since then the traction has been by locomotives. The road is not a main thoroughfare and is not much used; and I think that as regards the amount of the road traffic passing along it, and as regards the amount of the railway traffic passing across it, the result of the evidence is that, while there has been a considerable increase as compared with 1841, there has been no material increase or other material change of circumstances for at least the last twenty or thirty years. The crossing is watched in the usual way by a watchman, who lives on the spot. It is admitted that there has never been any accident upon or in connection with it. There are numerous similar level-crossings all over the district and county, some of them upon roads more important and more largely used.

---

"In these circumstances it is, I think, clearly impossible to entertain the pursuers' demand for the removal of the crossing. It is not necessary to affirm that when a crossing of the kind has been once sanctioned the owner acquires a permanent right which the road authority can in no circumstances recall. But where the construction of such a crossing has been authorised, and the crossing has thereafter been used for a period of fifty years, it is at least safe to say that the road authority seeking its removal must make out a strong case of public danger or public inconvenience, and will, moreover, scarcely succeed in making out such a case if the alleged danger or inconvenience turns out to be nothing new, and is no greater and no worse than is common to other level crossings in the district. Now, as already indicated, it does not seem to be possible to make out such a case here, and therefore I rather gathered that the pursuers did not seriously press the first conclusion of their summons, their contention rather being that they are entitled to impose reasonable conditions, and that if these are not accepted the crossing must be removed.

"Now, I am disposed to the opinion that it is always an implied condition of a grant or licence of this description that the grantee shall submit to such reasonable conditions as the road authority may from time to time find it necessary to impose; and therefore I think the question really is, whether the difference between the bond which the pursuers require as a condition of the continuance of this crossing, and the bond which the defender tenders in his minute No. 93 of process, is a difference sufficiently material to justify the pursuers in requiring that the crossing shall be removed.

"In my opinion, the difference between the parties in this matter is no difference at all. The defender offers to comply with all the structural requirements of the pursuers, and he also offers to become responsible for all accidents which may occur in consequence of the condition of the crossing. He also tenders the obligation of his tenants using the crossing to be responsible each for his own use of the crossing—the proprietorship of the engine drawing the traffic determining the responsibility in any case of mixed use. The pursuers, however, insist that the defender shall become liable, or that his tenants shall become conjunctly and severally liable for all accidents occurring through the negligent use of the crossing, whoever may be the party to blame; and it is upon this point that the parties have differed.

"In my opinion the pursuers are here asking what is unreasonable; or, rather, the defender's offer meets, in my opinion, the full substance of the pursuers' demand. In the first place, I as yet fail to see how in any circumstances the pursuers could be sued (I mean successfully) for the fault of a person lawfully using the crossing, any more than for the fault of a person lawfully using the road. I do not therefore see the pursuers' interest to demand the special indemnity which they seek. But, in the next place (and assuming the contrary), the pursuers have failed to suggest any reasonable or practical ground for rejecting the obligation of the actual users of the crossing expressed in such manner came to be of opinion, as here, that the public safety was endangered by its existence.[1] 2. Granting that they had acquiesced in the existence of the crossing for a long term of years, the defender was only entitled to take advantage of their acquiescence so far as the past was concerned.[2] 3. Alternatively, the conditions in the bond referred to in the summons were eminently reasonable, and they were not satisfied adequately by the terms of the bond which the defender now offered to execute. Conditions 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the pursuers' bond were not to be found in the latter bond. The defender must become liable, or his tenants must become jointly and severally liable, for all accidents occurring through negligent use of the crossing. In short, the pursuers were entitled to have some one person to whom they could look in the event of an accident happening.

No. 187.

June 18, 1891. Middle Ward of Lanarkshire Trustees v. Lord Belhaven's Trustee.

Argued for the defender;—1. Apart from the question of prescription, unless the Road Trustees could establish a distinct case of danger to the public, their acquiescence in the use of the level-crossing was a sufficient bar to the present demand.[3] The Lord President's dicta in the Cowdenbeath[4] case were (1) at best obiter, for the special agreement there under construction was very distinctly favourable to the trustees; (2) his Lordship only meant that statutory trustees could not legally bind themselves and their successors in all time coming to restrict their statutory rights and powers.[5] 2. In any view it fell upon the Road Trustees to make out a strong case of public danger through a change of circumstances since they originally sanctioned the use of the crossing. They had entirely failed to make out such a case. The only possible sources of danger suggested, viz., the upstanding levers and the absence of gates at the crossing, had been obviated by the defender's minute. The minute was further eminently reasonable. It was absurd to expect the defender to consent to become solely responsible for all accidents. He offered the bonds of all his tenants, new and old, using the crossing, each to become responsible for his own use of it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the Lord Ordinary is right. The condition of this district is such that it is occupied almost entirely by works of a large description requiring a great deal of traffic by railway and by road, and it is not at all surprising that arrangements have to be made to supply engines to all the works.

An application was made to the Road Trustees by Lord Belhaven on behalf of the railway company, on 11th September 1841, for leave to carry a branch of railway over a carriage road in the burgh of Wishaw. The application was granted, and the crossing has been used ever since that date by Lord that each shall be responsible for his own engine. The whole argument in the Procedure-roll went on the difficulty of ascertaining who was to blame in the case of mixed or rather combined trains, and the offer latterly made of making the ownership of the engine the test appears to me quite to meet that difficulty. I shall therefore, in respect of the defender's minute, dismiss the action; but as the defender's offer on record did not come up to the offer in the minute, and was not in my opinion altogether satisfactory, I shall (although with hesitation) find no expenses due to or by either party."

---

[1] Fifeshire Road Trustees v. Cowdenbeath Coal Co., Oct. 19, 1883, 11 R. 18, per Lord President, p. 21; Matson v. Baird & Co., Nov. 9, 1877, 5 R. 87, affirmed July 5, 1878, 5 R. (H. L.) 211.

[2] Moir v. Alloa Coal Co., Nov. 15, 1849, 12 D. 77, per Lord President, p. 83, and per Lord Mackenzie, p. 84, 21 Scot. Jur. 450.

[3] Moir v. Alloa Coal Co., vide supra, note 2.

[4] Fifeshire Road Trustees v. Cowdenbeath Coal Co., vide supra, note 1.

[5] Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald, Jan. 24, 1883, 10 R. 472, affd. July 23, 1883, 10 R. (H. L.) 85.

No. 187.

June 18, 1891. Middle Ward of Lanarkshire Trustees v. Lord Belhaven's Trustee.

Belhaven's trustees. It is in these circumstances that an action is brought to have the level-crossing removed. It is not proposed to limit the use of it, but to remove it altogether, and so to shut up an important access to the minerals. It would require, I think, cogent reasons to induce the Court to listen to such a proposal, and I have heard none such. I think the Lord Ordinary has very properly dismissed the action. It does not appear to me to be necessary to go into the circumstances further. I am for dismissing the action.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It appears that so long ago as September 1841 Lord Belhaven obtained leave from the Road Trustees to carry a branch of railway to his coal-works over a road called the "Manse Road." As I understand it, the railway was originally a horse-railway, and continued so till 1867, and if anything had happened in 1867 requiring a change I could understand such an action as we have here. But the railway has been used since 1867 as a steam-railway down to the present date, i.e., for four-and-twenty years, and the proposal in this action is, as your Lordship has pointed out, that Lord Belhaven should be ordained at once to remove the railway across the road.

I agree with what was decided in Moir v. Alloa Coal Co., that there is nothing to prevent road trustees granting leave to a railway company to cross one of their roads. It is often desirable for the convenience of the public, and I agree that if the permission is granted, and if in consequence large works have grown up in the district, the trustees are not entitled to remove the crossing arbitrarily. If that is so, it appears to me to follow that if a change is to be made there must be some arrangement as to the terms upon which it must be carried out. The Road Trustees have a duty to do all that is necessary for the safety of the public using the road, but, subject to that, I see no ground for the contention that they are entitled to insist on the crossing being removed.

It comes to be a question, I think, whether what is proposed is a matter of regulation and use. Now, as I understand, the only danger to the public suggested is that there are upstanding levers and no gates at the level-crossing. Lord Belhaven has however undertaken to supply them, and no doubt his obligation will be carried out. It appears to me, therefore, that all question of danger to the public is removed.

Then as to mere convenience to the public, it is not said that in the long tract of years which have elapsed since the crossing was made the public have complained or been inconvenienced by it.

As I understand from Mr Dickson, Lord Belhaven is perfectly ready to give an undertaking (and has given one in the minute) that he will be responsible for any accident due to the structural condition of the railway, but he declines to come under any obligation to be responsible for accidents which may occur from the use of the level-crossing; that is to say, he is perfectly ready to be responsible for his own acts in keeping the crossing in proper condition, but he declines to be responsible for the acts of others. That really is the whole subject of dispute between the parties, and it comes to be a very small matter indeed.

I agree with Lord Kinnear's remark made in the course of the debate, that the case does not involve any question of convenience and safety to the public, and that being so, and this being a matter of regulation, I think Lord Belhaven's offer a reasonable one. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the action ought to be dismissed.

No. 187.
June 16, 1891.
Middle Ward of Lanarkshire Trustees v. Lord Belhaven's Trustee.

LORD M'LAREN.—Your Lordships are all agreed that road trustees are not entitled to enter into agreements regarding the use of roads under their administration where the use is inconsistent with public convenience. On the other hand, it may sometimes be the best way of promoting the public convenience and facilitating traffic that the road trustees should empower mine-owners or persons willing to form private railways, to cross their roads under conditions consistent with the public safety. In the mining districts a vast number of these private railways have come into existence. They save the wear and tear of roads, and in many cases it would be impossible to carry on the mineral traffic of the district without them.

Now, the owners of the branch lines, if they went to Parliament, would undoubtedly obtain power to cross public roads by means of bridges or level crossings, according to the exigencies of the case, and I think we must recognise the power of road trustees to make such concessions without putting the owners to the expense of applying for parliamentary powers.

It may be that a right of crossing a public road which does not depend upon parliamentary powers, but on the permission of road trustees, is liable to be taken away if it can be shewn that its exercise is inconsistent with the primary use of the road, either in consequence of a change in the character of the locality or a great increase in the traffic of the road or the railway. Here no such case is made, and the question for our consideration is whether the Road Trustees, who in the fair and just exercise of their powers have given a right to the use of the crossing, are entitled to take it away without reason assigned, or (which is the same thing) to impose arbitrary and unreasonable conditions on the use of it.

I do not suppose that the trustees mean to be unreasonable, but your Lordships are of opinion that the right which they have given cannot be taken away without reference to the public or private convenience. We must therefore consider whether the conditions which they seek to impose are reasonable.

It seems to be reasonable that any person causing damage should be responsible for it, and Lord Belhaven has shewn his willingness to recognise this obligation; because he is willing to be responsible for such damage as may result from the defective state of the crossing. His tenants are to be taken responsible for damage resulting from the use of the crossing. To hold Lord Belhaven liable in all circumstances for all accidents which may occur would be an unreasonable condition, and one which the trustees are not entitled to impose as a condition of continuing the privilege.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

E. A. & F. HUNTER & Co., W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 188.
June 16, 1891.
Bennett v. Maclellan.

STEPHEN BENNETT AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—J. C. Thomson—Aitken.

WILLIAM W. MACLELLAN, Defender (Respondent).—Dickson—Ure.

Ship—Liability of owners inter se—Contribution.—All the owners of a ship except A, who had one share, were resident in England, and in an action in the English Courts, in which A was not called, were found liable to owners of cargo in damages caused by its loss. A, who resided in Scotland, was informed of the action, but did not interfere. In an action in the Scottish Courts against A at the instance of the other owners of the ship to have him found liable to contribute his share of the ship's liabilities, held that the costs of the English

No. 188.

June 16, 1891.
Bennett v. Maclellan.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
C.

action, at the instance of the cargo owners, fell to be included among these liabilities, and that the defender was liable for his share.

(Sequel of case reported ante, May 27, 1890, 17 R. 800.)

Stephen Bennett and others, all the owners of the ship "Austria" except one, William W. Maclellan, were resident in England. In an action in the English Courts against the owners resident in England (Leduc & Co. v. Ward), in which Maclellan was not called, the defenders were found liable to owners of cargo in damages caused by its loss. Mr Maclellan, who owned one share and resided in Scotland, was informed of the action, but did not interfere. In an action (originally brought in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire) at the instance of the owners who had paid the amount of the ship's liabilities, the First Division found Maclellan liable to pay his share of the liabilities—being a seventeenth part of the whole amount of the sums for which the owners were liable—(May 27, 1890, 17 R. 800).

A remit was made to the Sheriff "to ascertain the true amount of the pursuers' claim."

A statement of the amount claimed by the pursuers—being the principal sum with the deductions which they proposed to allow—was thereafter lodged, and these, with certain objections for the defender, were remitted to an accountant to report upon. Ultimately the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) sustained certain of the defender's objections, but in an appeal to the Court of Session the only findings to which the pursuers took exception were those relating to the costs of the original action at the instance of Leduc & Company, the cargo owners, for a share of which the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) had held that the defender was not liable.

The defender maintained that he had not been called in, and was no party to the English action; that he had received intimation of it, but had refused to take any share in it; and that accordingly there was no reason why he should be made to pay a share of the expenses. Looking to the merits of the action of Leduc & Co. v. Ward, the name under which the case was reported,[1] it was not a reasonable one to defend. The body of co-owners acted through the ship's-husband, and, unless he had an express mandate, he could not make the defender responsible for the expenses of the defence.[2] The only ground on which the defender could be held liable was that of recompense, and there was no such case here.[3]

Argued for the pursuers;—The defence of the action was a proper incident of the management of the ship; and that being so, the defender was liable. One or more of the co-owners might have defended the action, in which case all would have been liable. It was not a case in which the managing owner had to make up his mind whether he would defend the action or not.

Lord Adam.—The Sheriff-substitute has found that the defender is not liable for a share of the expenses in the English action by Leduc & Company, the cargo owners, against the owners of the "Austria," for which the latter have been found liable, but I cannot concur in his judgment. The specialties of the case are (1) that the pursuers are all resident in England, while the defender is resident in Scotland, and is not subject to the jurisdiction of the English Courts. The pursuers were clearly entitled to select one or more of the co-owners to defend the case, and were entitled to make them primarily responsible for the defence. This was a right which they exercised. It is clear that although the

[1] Leduc & Co. v. Ward, 1888, L. R., 20 Q. B. D. 475.
[2] Campbell v. Stein, March 1868, 6 Dow, 116.
[3] Buchanan v. Stewart, Nov. 10, 1874, 2 R. 78.

No. 188.
June 16, 1891.
Bennett v. Maclellan.

decree of the English Courts might not be res judicata in Scotland, beyond doubt it would have settled the question of liability as regards the defender. The position of a joint owner in a matter of this nature is that it is his duty to say whether he will take part in the action or not. If the defence turns out to be successful, he would derive full benefit from that success. If it is unsuccessful, he, according to his contention, is entitled to have the action defended at the expense of his co-owners. A co-owner who is called upon to defend an action is not entitled to put his co-owners in that position. His duty is to say—I do not think this an action which ought to be defended, and I will therefore be no party to the defence. If he takes up that position he will be free. But he is not entitled to hold his hand, and allow his co-owners to conduct the defence, and then decline to admit liability for it. I see no evidence that this was not a bona fide defence. All the solvent owners concurred in it. It was no doubt unsuccessful, but, as I have said, that fact is not sufficient to free the defender from responsibility for his share of the expenses. I cannot therefore agree with the Sheriff-substitute.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor (dated 18th July 1891) recalling hoc statu the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutors; finding "that the defender is liable to the pursuers in one-seventeenth of the expenses of the said action Leduc against Ward and Others, with interest thereon," and that the balance brought out in the accountant's report fell to be altered in accordance therewith, &c.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 189.
June 19, 1891.
Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

THE GOVERNORS AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Murray—Fleming.
JAMES REID STEWART, Defender (Respondent).—C. J. Guthrie—Dickson.

Mines and Minerals—Conveyance of lands reserving the coal—Title—Construction—Extrinsic evidence—Singular successor—Acquiescence.—A disposition of lands reserved the coal to the disponer, with the exception of a specified portion underneath the mansion-house and another underneath the line of a proposed railway, and further reserved full power to the disponer "to work, win, and carry away the said coal, provided this be done without entering upon the surface of the said lands and estate." The disposition further provided that if it should be necessary for the support of the mansion-house or of the railway that a larger quantity of coal should be left unworked, the disponee should be entitled to purchase such larger quantity from the disponer at the rate of £1000 per acre.

A singular successor of the disponee brought an action for declarator that the disponer was bound to work the coal so as not to bring down the surface.

A proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that the coal could be worked to a profit only on the longwall system, the inevitable result of which was to bring down the surface; that it was being so worked at the date of the disposition, and that the disponee (who was himself a coalmaster) was aware that it was being so worked and that it could not otherwise be profitably worked; and that the injury to the surface would be small in comparison with the loss which would result from working the coal on another system.

Held, on a construction of the disposition read in the light of the circumstances as existing at its date, that the disponer must be held to have reserved the right to work the coal in the way in which it was being worked at the date of the disposition, although the result of the working should be to injure the surface, altering interlocutor of Lord Wellwood, Ordinary, who held that, upon the construction of the disposition, the defender was not entitled to work the

No. 189.

June 19, 1891. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

minerals so as to bring down the surface, but on the proof that the pursuer had acquiesced in his doing so.

Opinions per curiam contra on the question of acquiescence.

Interdict.—It is not a ground for refusing to enforce an established right by interdict that the granting of interdict will cause inconvenience or pecuniary loss to the person resisting the granting of the interdict out of all proportion to the loss which would result to the other party from refusing interdict.

1st Division. Ld. Wellwood. C.

By disposition, dated 8th and 12th July 1875, James Reid Stewart, the proprietor of the lands of Calderpark, Lanarkshire, in consideration of the price of £35,000, conveyed these lands to John Hendrie, coalmaster, Glasgow, together with the mansion-house thereon, and also a statutory notice, served on the disponer by the Glasgow, Hamilton, Bothwell, and Coatbridge Railway, taking compulsorily a portion of the lands for the purposes of their railway, then in course of construction.

The deed contained a reservation of the coal in the following terms:—"But excepting and reserving from the lands, subjects, and others hereby conveyed the whole coal under the same other than (first) the portion thereof which is delineated and shaded with brown parallel lines on the plan annexed and subscribed by me as relative hereto, containing 2·856 acres or thereby, and (second) the portion thereof which is delineated and shaded with blue parallel lines on the said plan, and containing 3·144 acres or thereby, with full power to me and my foresaids or our tenants to work, win, and carry away the said coal, provided this can be done without entering upon the surface of the said lands and estate; but providing and declaring that my said disponee and his foresaids shall have right, should they find it necessary for the support of the said mansion-house and offices, or any of them, or for the support of the bridge or viaduct to be constructed on the said lands for carrying the authorised Glasgow, Bothwell, Hamilton, and Coatbridge Railway over the river Calder, or the works connected with the said bridge or viaduct, that a larger quantity of coal should be left unworked than is contained in the said two portions of land, to purchase from me or my heirs and successors such additional quantity of coal as they shall find necessary for such supports, the price of which shall be calculated at the rate of £1000 per acre of wholly unworked coal; also declaring that it shall be lawful to me, and my successors in the mines and minerals in each side of the said portions of land, containing respectively 2·856 acres and 3·144 acres, and to my and their lessees, in working the said mines and minerals, to cut and make such and so many airways, headways, roadways, gateways, and water-levels through the mines, minerals or strata in the said portions of land as may be requisite for ventilating, draining, or working the said mines and minerals; but no such airway, headway, roadway, gateway, or water-level shall be of greater dimensions or section than 8 feet wide and 6 feet high, nor shall the same be cut or made so as to injure the surface of the land, or the buildings, railway, or works thereon, or to impede the passage thereon." Hendrie was sequestrated in 1884.

By disposition dated 27th to 31st January 1888, John Graham, C.A., Glasgow, trustee upon Hendrie's sequestrated estates, conveyed the lands of Calderpark to the Bank of Scotland—who were creditors of Hendrie—for the price of £16,000. This disposition contained an exception of the minerals in terms mutatis mutandis identical with that in the disposition by Stewart to Hendrie, and further assigned, inter alia "(second), all claims competent to me, as trustee foresaid, for damages occasioned to the said lands by the workings of the mineral proprietors, or their authors or successors, or their tenants, and that whether the said damage was caused before or after the date of my said disponee's entry to the subjects hereby disponed under these presents, but in so far only as the same have not been already paid for or compensated by the said James Reid Stewart."

No. 189.

June 19, 1891.

Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

In September 1890 the Bank of Scotland brought an action against Stewart concluding for declarator, "that the defender is not entitled to work, win, interfere with, or carry away the coal, ironstone, and other metals and minerals in the pursuers' lands after mentioned in such a manner as not to leave sufficient support for the pursuers' said lands above and adjacent to the seam or seams worked by him, and that the defender, in working and winning any of the said minerals, is bound to do so in such a manner as not to break, injure, or alter the level of the surface of the pursuers' said lands, or so as to endanger the said surface being injured or altered in level, or to cause disturbance or subsidence of any part of the said lands"; for interdict against the defender "working, winning, interfering with, or away taking the said coal, ironstone, and other metals and minerals, or any part thereof, in any part of the pursuers' said lands, in such a manner as to break, injure, or alter the level of the surface of the pursuers' said lands, or any part thereof, or so as to endanger the said surface being injured or altered in level, or to cause disturbance or subsidence of any part of the pursuers' said lands"; and for payment of £5000 in name of damages.

The pursuers, after setting forth their titles, averred;—(Cond. 5) "There exist in the foresaid lands and others the following seams of coal,—viz., Pyotshaw, Main, Splint, and Virgin or Wee coal. These seams have all been and are being worked by the defender in the pursuers' lands aforesaid, and that since the year 1877, by the longwall system, which is a system of complete exhaustion by which the whole coal is completely excavated and removed without leaving in any stoops or pillars for the support of the lands above and adjacent to the said workings, and by which the natural levels of the said lands must be and is necessarily altered, and the buildings thereon necessarily broken and damaged. The said system was first adopted in the Clydesdale district about the year 1850." The defender "has further encroached upon the coal under Calderpark house and grounds."

The defender answered;—(Ans. 5) "Admitted that in the lands referred to the seams of coal mentioned exist, and that these seams have been worked by the defender by the longwall system, by which the whole coal is excavated without leaving in any stoops. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that for about seven years prior to the date when the defender conveyed to Mr Hendrie the surface of the said lands, the coal therein had been wrought by the defender by the longwall system, or other system of complete excavation. These systems secured complete excavation of the mineral, and the plans of the colliery, as Mr Hendrie well knew, were laid out with a view to the continuance of this mode of working. And since that date the same systems have been pursued without objection till the present time, and the defender has, in the full knowledge of the said John Hendrie and the pursuers, expended large sums of money for the purpose of continuing such working. The systems of complete excavation are the systems customarily pursued in the district, and are the only systems whereby the minerals can be wrought to profit, and they were fully in view of the parties at the time when the conveyance to Mr Hendrie—who was himself a coalmaster—was granted. These were the systems in use in the district, and they were in use specially throughout the Lanarkshire and Clydesdale coal basins, from time immemorial. And indeed at the date of the conveyance to Mr Hendrie, surface damage had, as both parties to that deed well knew, already been done to the lands conveyed in consequence of the ordinary working of the minerals. Quoad ultra denied."

No. 189.

June 19, 1891. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

The pursuers, after specifying injuries to the surface which they said had already been occasioned by the defender's workings, further averred; —(Cond. 8) "If the workings in the minerals belonging to the defender are allowed to proceed the damage already caused will be intensified, and the area of damage will be largely increased, with the result that the subjects belonging to the pursuers will be greatly deteriorated in value, and the beneficial use of them will be very seriously impeded, and for some purposes destroyed." The defender answered;—(Ans. 8) "Denied. In the seams of coal in the lands in question already opened up there are yet nearly a million tons of coal, and in the seams proposed to be wrought there is an even greater quantity. In order to work out this mineral the defender has erected extensive machinery and incurred considerable expenditure. This expenditure will all be rendered useless if the workings are now stopped. The only buildings on the lands are the mansion-house of Calderpark (now an old building) and offices, and a few miners' houses. The agricultural value of the land is only about 25s. per acre."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers being owners of the lands described in the summons, under exception of the coals and minerals belonging to the defender, are entitled to prevent these coals and minerals being worked in a way to cause subsidence to their lands. (2) The defender has no right to work the coal and minerals belonging to him so as to cause subsidence to the surface belonging to the pursuers. (3) The defender, or those for whom he is responsible, having illegally worked minerals in the said lands, and carried on operations which have caused subsidence and other injuries to the pursuers' lands, is liable in damages. (4) The pursuers having suffered loss and damage to the extent sued for, are entitled to decree of payment in terms of the petitory conclusions of the summons. (5) The pursuers are further entitled to decree of declarator and interdict as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The defender's right to the minerals subjacent to the pursuers' lands being, under the titles of the parties, free from limitation of any kind, he ought to be assoilzied from the declaratory conclusions of the summons. (4) The defender is entitled to continue the working of the coal in the manner in use at the time of the sale of the surface, and which was the customary mode of working for upwards of the previous forty years. (5) The defender being willing to pay for any injury he may do to the surface (so far as not paid for), the pursuers are not entitled to interdict as craved. (6) The defender having in the full knowledge of the said John Hendrie and the pursuers expended large sums of money for working the coals by the said customary mode of working, the pursuers are not entitled to interdict.

On 19th November 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) allowed a proof at large before answer.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—A proof at large should not be allowed, as the rights of the parties were embodied in the titles, and it was not necessary to go beyond these. The proof should be restricted to the averments of damage.

After a hearing, on 7th January 1891,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In a question of this kind, arising upon the construction of a contract, the Court are quite entitled to avail themselves of any light they may derive from such evidence as will place them in the same state of knowledge as was possessed by the parties at the time that the contract was entered into. Now, there are averments upon this record which if proved will exhibit the parties in a position towards one another at the date of the contract that is calculated to throw a great deal of light upon the meaning of the titles. Upon that ground alone I am prepared to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The proof is before answer, and it is not represented that that which the Lord Ordinary has allowed will greatly exceed in length the proof which it is admitted must be led. I think that the Lord Ordinary has exercised a wise discretion in not restricting it as the reclaimer proposes. The Court are always unwilling to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary in a matter of this kind.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

The following was the import of the proof. At the date of the disposition to Hendrie the coal in question was being worked on the longwall system, by which the whole coal was excavated, with the necessary result of bringing down the surface more or less. This was the only system by which, at the prices current at the date of the proof, the pits in question could be wrought to a profit.* In 1882 Hendrie took a lease from the defender of 11½ acres of the coal in question. The terms of this lease are sufficiently quoted in the Lord Ordinary's note, infra. In 1884 Hendrie's trustee made a claim against the defender for damages in respect of injuries to the surface through the defender's working, and £1400 was awarded as damages by arbitration. The parties to the present action agreed by joint minute that £250 represented the amount of damage already occasioned and not compensated, and it appeared that the loss which would be caused to the defender from being obliged to work so as not to injure the surface—involving as that would practically do the stopping of the pits—would be out of all proportion to the loss which would be caused to the pursuers through injury to the surface. The defender had incurred a large expenditure in the erection of machinery, sinking of shafts, &c., in connection with the working of the coal, but the shafts were sunk in an adjoining property, with which either Hendrie nor the pursuers had anything to do. There was about million tons of unwrought coal in the three seams which had been opened, and there were two lower seams unopened, for the opening of which, however, preparations had been made. The pursuers had bought the estate at a public roup. Their manager deponed that he knew that the pits were being worked, but he did not know, and made no inquiry, as to the nature of the workings.

---

* Hendrie deponed,—"At the time I acquired the property I knew there were coal workings going on underneath. I knew that these were being carried on upon the ordinary system of total excavation. This was in 1874. The mode of working minerals at that time in that district was either the longwall system or the room-and-rance system, in which the stoops were afterwards wrought. The system of complete excavation is the only one under which seams of that thickness can be commercially wrought. I knew that subsidence was being caused by these workings, and that consequent damage to the surface could be to some extent inevitable. I did not apprehend that the injury to the surface would be much as compared with the value of the coal. Between 1874 and 1884 the coal was worked out to a considerable extent, and the surface lowered in consequence. I made no objection to the mode in which the coal was being wrought."

No. 189.

June 19, 1891. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

On 18th February 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in respect of the joint minute, No 99 of process, that damage has been caused to the surface of the pursuers' lands by the defender's workings to the extent of £250: Finds that in respect payment of the said sum of £250 has been made by the defender to the pursuers, it is unnecessary to pronounce decree therefor: Quoad ultra sustains the fifth and sixth pleas in law for the defender, and assoilzies the defender from the remaining conclusions of the summons as laid, reserving to the pursuers right to sue for damages in the event of the defender's future workings causing injury to the surface of the lands described in the summons," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The deed does not contain any express reservation of right to work out the minerals so as to leave no support for the surface; the only question is whether such a right is reserved by clear implication. Having regard to the strict judicial construction of such documents in favour of the surface owner, especially in recent cases in this Court and in the House of Lords, I am not prepared to hold that such a right is to be implied. The defender's contention is that in this deed the disponee stipulated for all the support which he desired and required for the surface, and that it therefore must be inferred that he consented to the disponer exhausting the remainder of the coal. It may be that this was the real intention of parties, and the disponee's subsequent actings give colour to that view. But the terms of the deed will not support the implication contended for. I think that the stipulations in favour of the disponee in regard to the blocks of coal to be left unworked underneath the mansion-house and offices and viaduct, which are chiefly relied on by the defender, can be reasonably explained on the footing that the disponee found it necessary to make special provision for the support of those parts of the estate which were burdened, or were about to be burdened, with heavy buildings, and thus were, or were about to be, in a non-natural state. But it does not follow that he thereby abandoned his right to insist on support for the rest of the surface. Besides, the deed does not contain any compensation clause. In this respect the defender's case is even weaker than previous cases, in which it was unsuccessfully contended that the mine-owner was entitled to work out the minerals on payment of damages. In particular, in the case of White v. Dixon, 9 R. 375, affirmed 10 R. (H. of L.) 45, the deed on the terms of which the question depended provided that the mine-owner should indemnify the owner of the surface for the whole damage and injury occasioned by the operations which he was empowered to carry on. Yet, notwithstanding this stipulation, the Court held that the obligation to pay damages did not confer right to bring down the surface on paying damages. Again, to refer, by way of contrast, to those cases in which the mine-owner was held entitled to work out the minerals without leaving support for the surface, it will be found that the deed or deeds which were held to form the contract either contained express power to do so, or stipulations of such a character that the power was necessarily to be implied. Of the former class was Buchanan v. Andrew, 11 Macph. (H. of L.) 13, reversing the decision of the Court of Session, 9 Macph. 554; and of the latter the case of Aspden v. Seddon, 1875, where there was a stipulation for payment of money by way of compensation, 10 Chanc. App., L. R., 394.

"I therefore think that if regard is only to be had to the titles of the parties, the defender has not instructed a right to work out the minerals reserved without leaving support for the surface, whether he offers to pay damages or not. . . .

"But two serious questions remain, viz.:—(1) Whether the pursuers' authors did not by their actings surrender or lose the absolute right of support which they originally had; and (2) whether, even assuming that they did not do so, declarator and interdict should be granted as concluded for. As the defender is willing to pay damages if allowed to work out the minerals, it is immaterial, perhaps, to him which of those points is decided in his favour; but I shall consider them in their order.

"Although on the face of his title Hendrie was not (as I hold) deprived of

No. 189.
June 19, 1891.
Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—On the construction of the titles, the Lord Ordinary had taken the sound view. There was no express and did not surrender, his absolute right at common law to have the surface supported and to refuse to accept damages in lieu thereof, there is no doubt that at the date of the purchase he was well aware that the defender had for some years been working out the minerals on the footing of total exhaustion; and being himself a coalmaster, he knew that this mode of excavation was the only one under which seams of the thickness of those in question could be wrought to commercial profit. He also knew that that mode of working had caused, and would in future cause, a certain amount of subsidence of the surface; but he says in his evidence,—'I did not apprehend that the injury to the surface would be much, as compared with the value of the coal.'

"In 1882 he shewed his faith in this belief in a very practical manner by taking a lease from the defender for 11½ acres of the coal in question, 'with full power to the said lessee, at his own expense, to search for, work, win, and carry away and dispose of the coal hereby let as fully and freely as the said James Reid Stewart could do himself.' The lease provided for total excavation by the lessee, and contains this provision,—'The second party (Hendrie) hereby expressly renounces and discharges all claims competent to him as proprietor of the surface of the said lands or otherwise in any manner of way against the first party (the defender) in respect of any damages which may have been or may be occasioned by his operations under this lease.'

"The lease was for the space of ten years from Martinmas 1879, that being the date apparently at which Hendrie began to work the coal let. Now, I cannot reconcile this contract and what followed on it with the view that Hendrie retained, or intended to retain, an absolute right to support for the surface quoad the rest of the mineral field underneath the lands of Calderpark. The terms of the lease should be closely examined. They shew complete knowledge and approval on Hendrie's part of the nature and extent of the defender's workings. Hendrie stipulates for power to work the coal let as fully and freely as the defender could do himself. He then binds himself under penalties to work out the coal exhaustively; and there are even provisions in the lease to the effect that where the coal is wrought in the pillar and stall mode, the lessee should leave in the first instance pillars of sufficient dimensions to secure of its being ultimately wrought out with the least possible loss of mineral. Where possible damage to the surface is referred to, money damages are indicated as being the appropriate and only remedy.

"But the evidence of acquiescence does not stop there. In 1884, Mr Hendrie's affairs having become embarrassed, his trustee made a claim against the defender for damages in respect of injuries to the surface caused by the mineral workings; and after a protracted arbitration a sum of £1400 of damages was awarded. Now, during the ten years between 1874 and 1884, and in the course of the proceedings in the arbitration,—in which the defender's working plans were, I understand, produced and examined,—Hendrie and his trustee must have been well aware of the nature of the defender's operations: that he had for years been working out the coal on the footing of total exhaustion, that he intended to work out the remainder of the minerals by the same process, and that for that purpose he had incurred large expenses in the erection of machinery and sinking of shafts, driving of levels, and otherwise. The three sets of plans produced in this process (being Nos. 78, 79, and 80 of process) shew at a glance the nature and extent of the defender's operations from 1869 to 1889, which were absolutely inconsistent with the idea that the surface was to be supported, and which a practical man could not see going on without knowing perfectly what the result of the operations would be.

"Now, it seems to me that the circumstances which I have just mentioned are such as to entitle the Court to presume an agreement on the part of Hendrie and his trustee to waive the absolute right which they have under their title, and to rest content with the payment of damages for such injuries as might be caused to the surface by the defender's workings. Mr Bell in his Principles,

No. 189. reservation of the right to bring down the surface, subject only to payment of damages. Nor would the titles, taken per se and without refer-section 946, states the effect of acquiescence thus :—'Where great cost is incurred by operations carried on under the eye of one having a right to stop them, or where under the eye and with the knowledge of him who has the adverse right something is allowed to be done which manifestly cannot be undone, the law will presume an agreement or conventional permission as a fair ground of right.' I may also refer to the Lord Chancellor, Lord Chelmsford's, opinion in the case of the Bargaddie Coal Company v. Wark (3 Macqueen, 467, 479, 480), in which he quotes with approval the passage from Bell's Principles which I have quoted. It has been said that the right of support cannot be lost except by express renunciation; but this is not established by authority; and although the proof of acquiescence must be full, I do not think that in this matter the right of support has any peculiar sanctity. It was once said by Lord Denman (Hilton v. Granville, 1844, 1 Craig and Philips, 283, 5 Q. B. 780), that even an express renunciation of it would be unavailing. But this dictum is now repudiated (Andrew v. Buchanan), and I think also that now the ordinary rules of law applicable to acquiescence would be equally applied in a question as to the right of support as in the case of any other contract. I do not think that the present pursuers are in a better position than their authors. In 1888 the pursuers, who were creditors of Hendrie, obtained from his then trustee, Mr John Graham, a conveyance of the lands, the consideration named being £16,000. In the deed of conveyance Graham assigned to the bank certain claims to which he had right as Hendrie's trustee, and amongst them, '(Second) All claims competent to me as trustee foresaid for damages occasioned to the said lands by the workings of the mineral proprietors, or their authors or successors, or their tenants, and that whether the said damage was caused before or after the date of my said disponee's entry to the subjects hereby disponed under these presents, but in so far only as the same have not been already paid for or compensated by the said James Reid Stewart.' The pursuers had thus full notice that their authors had been in use to accept damages for injuries caused to the surface by the defender's workings; and the words of the clause which I have underlined indicate that this practice was to continue, because the claims assigned were claims in respect of future as well as past damages.

June 19, 1891. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

"In Davis v. Treharne, 6 App. Ca., L. R. 460, Lord Blackburn says (p. 466), —'I think it must be taken as perfectly settled ground that as of common right the surface land has a right to be supported by subjacent strata of minerals. Although that is common right, it may be shewn—the burden lying upon those who wish to shew it—that the person who has got the surface obtained it either upon terms which would give him no right to support, he having accepted it and taken it upon those terms, or that before he got it the person from whom he claims, the owner of the surface, had parted with the right to support from below, in which case, of course, the owner of the surface could be in no better position than the person who sold it to him.'

"On the grounds which I have stated I am inclined to think that the burden indicated by Lord Blackburn in the latter part of the passage quoted has been discharged by the defender, and that there is sufficient evidence that the owner of the surface surrendered his right to support on condition of payment of damages.

"I am further of opinion that even if the evidence falls short of complete proof of surrender of the right of support, interdict should not be granted in the circumstances of the case, because the loss which would result to the defender from the stoppage of his works would be out of all proportion to any advantage which the owner of the surface would obtain. In judging whether in such cases interdict should be granted or refused, the Courts of law both in this country and in England have been in use to exercise an equitable discretion; and if they are satisfied that the loss to the person sought to be interdicted would be greatly in excess of the benefit to the other party, they are in use to refuse interdict, and to compel the party seeking interdict to content himself with damages.

No. 189.

June 19, 1891.

Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

ence to the evidence, bear that construction by implication. The cases shewed that, to deprive the owner of the surface of his common law right to have that surface preserved intact, the implication must be very clear,[1] which it was not in the present instance. The defender no doubt expressly excepted from his reservation of the coal the right to enter upon the surface, but it did not follow from that that he had reserved the right to bring down the surface. Nor did the stipulation as to payment of £1000 per acre in the event of more coal being required for the support of the mansion-house or the railway affect the question. What was there in view was the contingency of additional buildings being erected, which would require a non-natural support to the surface. Then it was incompetent to look at the evidence, for there was no such ambiguity in the titles as to require the aid of extrinsic evidence. But assuming the competency of the evidence, all it proved was that Hendrie was a coalmaster and knew the method of working. It was by no means a necessary consequence of that knowledge that he intended, in buying the surface, to exclude the common law right of support. The Lord Ordinary's judgment upon the ground of acquiescence was erroneous. If the pursuers' author had acquired the right to demand support to the surface, there was nothing to shew that he had surrendered that right. The lease of 1882 only shewed that he had given up his right to surface damage so far as related to the 11½ acres thereby let. Nor did the fact that

---

They are the more ready to adopt this course if the party sought to be interdicted has, as here, been permitted or induced to continue his operations and incur large expense by the actings and apparent acquiescence of the person seeking interdict, or his authors.

"Now, I think it is proved that if the defender continues to work out the minerals as he is doing some subsidence of the surface will be caused. It is also proved that seams of the thickness of those in question cannot be worked to profit except on the footing of total exhaustion. If, then, the defender were interdicted from working the minerals 'in such a manner as to break, injure, or alter the level of the surface of the pursuers' said lands, or any part thereof, or so as to endanger the said surface being injured or altered in level, or to cause the disturbance or subsidence of any part of the said lands,' he would be obliged to abandon the working of those minerals altogether; and as there are still unworked nearly three million tons of coal, including the lower seams, the loss to the defender would necessarily be very large.

"Next, as to the pursuers' interest to obtain an interdict, one object in allowing a proof was to allow the pursuers to prove the damage which they had sustained, which they estimated at £5000. It now appears that the damage actually sustained is covered by a sum of £250, as against an estimated annual loss to the defender of £4000 to £6000 if he were obliged to abandon the mine. It may be that in future damage to a greater extent may be caused; but dealing with the question of interdict on the evidence before me, I do not think that there are sufficient grounds for subjecting the defender to such a penal prohibition for disturbance of the surface. So far as can be seen or anticipated, the pursuers will be sufficiently compensated by payment of damages should further subsidence take place.

"The result is, that I am not prepared to grant decree of declarator and interdict in the terms asked, because the effect of such a decree would be to prevent the defender from working the coal at all. I shall therefore grant decree for the sum of £250 agreed upon, and quoad ultra assoilzie the defender from the action as laid, reserving to the pursuers their right to claim damages from the defender should the defender's workings cause injury to the surface in the future."

[1] White v. Dixon, March 19, 1883, 10 R. (H. L.) 45; Buchanan v. Andrew, March 10, 1873, 11 Macph. (H. L.) 13, 45 Scot. Jur. 172; Aspden v. Seddon, 1875, L. R., 10 Ch. App. 394.

No. 189.

June 19, 1891. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

Hendrie's trustee had accepted £1400 in name of damages in 1884 prove that for the future the right to surface support was surrendered. Then, none of the defender's pits were sunk on the lands in question, or on lands belonging to the pursuers or their authors. It was impossible to say therefore that the works erected by the defender had been erected on the faith of Hendrie's acquiescence, for Hendrie could not have prevented these works if he would. In any case the pursuers were singular successors, and were not bound by the acting of parties not appearing on the record. Lastly, the Lord Ordinary was in error in refusing interdict. The comparative interest of the parties was a relevant consideration in a question of interim interdict, but when the pursuers' right was established—as ex hypothesi it was here—it was irrelevant to say that the gain to him from granting interdict would be small in comparison with the loss which the defender would sustain.[1]

Argued for the defender;—If the titles were read in the light of the evidence as to the knowledge of the parties at the date of the contract,—and it was competent so to read the titles,—the only reasonable conclusion was that the parties did not intend that the right to surface support should be given to the disponee. Both parties were coalmasters, and were conversant with the methods of working coal, and they knew that the only practicable method of working this coal was by the longwall system. It was inconceivable therefore that they should not have intended that the defender should work on that system. Where they did not intend that the surface should be brought down they reserved the coal in toto, and they further provided that if any greater amount of absolute support should be necessary, the whole coal under the required surface should be bought and paid for at so much per acre. But assuming that the right to support had been reserved, the Lord Ordinary was right in holding that the pursuers' author must be held by his conduct to have surrendered that right.[2]

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—Prior to the year 1875 the defender was proprietor of the estate of Calderpark, in the parish of Old Monkland and county of Lanark. In that year he disponed the estate to Mr Hendrie, reserving the mines and minerals, and the pursuers, who are the Bank of Scotland, are now in right of Mr Hendrie, and their title exactly repeats the original title to Mr Hendrie. Now, I do not think there is any difficulty or dispute about the law where the rights to the surface and the rights to the mines and minerals become involved. I think the principle of law that comes into operation is sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas—you shall so use your own property as not to injure that of your neighbour—and in conformity with that the result is that the proprietor of the mines and minerals cannot work them if the result of such working would be an injury to the surface—that is to say, if it would bring down the surface or injure buildings and erections upon the surface. If that is the result of the working the proprietor of the mines may be stopped from so working them. In other words, the proprietor of the surface is entitled to absolute security. I think that is the legal right where there is nothing peculiar and there is a separation of the right to the surface and the right to the mines and minerals. But then the titles of [1] Hole v. Barlow, 1858, 4 C. B. (N. S.) 334; Bamford v. Turnley, 3 Best & Smith, 62.

[2] Authorities in the Lord Ordinary's note, and Moore v. Paterson, Dec. 16, 1881, 9 R. 337; Graham v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, July 26, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 91.

No. 189.
June 19, 1891.
Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

the parties may shew that the rights reserved are not exactly those that would arise from the legal relations, and accordingly the first question in this case is, whether or not it appears from a construction of the titles that the defender when he reserved the rights to the mines and minerals reserved also a right to take them although the result of that might be that it would injure or let down the surface. The defender says that upon the construction of the titles that is the right he reserved—the right, namely, of working these minerals although the result should be to cause injury to the surface. That question then has to be solved, as it appears to me, from the construction of the disposition in favour of Mr Hendrie, or the disposition by Mr Hendrie to the Bank of Scotland, because they are both in the same terms, and in order to properly construe that title,—that deed,—I think we are entitled to look at the surrounding circumstances at its date to see what the parties really had in their mind when so contracting.

Now, there is no doubt that they were contracting with reference to the sale of a mineral estate in which, in point of fact, there were unworked minerals still subsisting of great value. I think it is also perfectly clear that at the time of the contract all the parties were aware that these mines of coal were actually being worked by pits belonging to the defender, who happened to be proprietor of the adjoining lands of Calderbank. I think it is also indisputable from the facts of the case, that they were aware that these minerals were, as might have been expected, to be continued to be worked. That appears clearly from the disposition in the pursuer's favour, because it makes provision for certain consequences which would be the necessary result of the continued working of the minerals. I think it is quite obvious too that the parties were aware that the coal was being worked by a system which exhausted the whole minerals under the ground, with the necessary and unavoidable result that the surface would be brought down. I think, further, it must have been quite within the view of parties that any loss which might arise from the working of the minerals in the way I have stated—any loss or injury to the surface—was not in point of pecuniary value of any comparison with the value of the minerals if it became impossible that these minerals should be worked. I think, as the Lord Ordinary says for a different purpose from that to which I propose to apply it, it is the fact that the damages claimed for injury to the surface amount to the small sum of £250, whereas the result of stopping the working of the minerals would be to cause a loss of many thousand pounds.

Now, these were the facts, and that was the situation and state of knowledge of the parties when this contract was entered into; and the question is, whether upon a construction of this disposition the defender, besides reserving the mines and minerals with full power to remove the minerals, reserved to himself the right to do so although it might result in injury to the surface. I quite agree that that must either be the result of direct expression in the disposition, or of clear implication to that effect. If there are clauses in the deed which clearly imply a reservation of power to that effect to the defender, I see no reason why effect should not be given to that just as in any other case. I do not see that the fact that the question is one between the proprietor of the surface and the proprietor of the coal should make any difference in the construction of the disposition, and I propose to construe this deed as I would construe any other.

Now, that brings me to consider the terms of the deed itself, and by it it will be observed that Mr Stewart, the defender, for the sum of £35,000 conveyed the lands in question—they are now called Calderpark—and the mansion-house and so on. Then comes the reservation—"But excepting and reserving from the lands, subjects, and others hereby conveyed the whole coal under the same." Then comes the exception, "other than (first) the portion thereof which is delineated and shaded with brown . . . containing 2·856 acres or thereby, and (second) the portion thereof which is delineated and shaded with blue . . . containing 3·144 acres or thereby." That is the exception to the grant. He excepts the coal from the grant, but then from the exception of the coal there is excepted again all the coal within two small areas of between two and three acres respectively. Then follows the power which the defender reserved—"With full power to me and my foresaids, or our tenants, to work, win, and carry away the said coal, provided this be done without entering upon the surface of the said lands and estate." Then there is a right to the purchaser, if he shall require it, to purchase part of the coal which Mr Stewart reserved to himself; it is in these terms,—"But providing and declaring that my said disponee and his foresaids shall have right, should they find it necessary for the support of the said mansion-house and offices, or any of them, or for the support of the bridge or viaduct to be constructed on the said lands" for carrying a certain railway "that a larger quantity of coal should be left unworked than is contained in the said two portions of land,"—that is, the two acres and the three acres—"to purchase from me or my heirs and successors such additional quantity of coal as they shall find necessary for such supports, the price of which shall be calculated at the rate of £1000 per acre of wholly unworked coal." Then there is a further power given to Mr Stewart—that is, that he should have power to make airways and roadways and so on through that coal underneath the railway viaduct and mansion-house which he had not reserved to himself, but had passed on to the pursuers as proprietors of the surface. He reserves power to make such airways, &c., with this limitation, that they are not to be "made so as to injure the surface of the lands, or the buildings, railway, or works thereon." These are all the provisions of the contract to which I need refer.

No. 189.

June 19, 1891. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

Now, the first clause which requires some attention is the one where after reserving the coal to himself the disponer, Mr Stewart, reserves this power—"With full power to me and my foresaids, or our tenants, to work, win, and carry away the said coal, provided this can be done without entering upon the surface of the said lands and estate." The first observation I have to make upon that clause is this, that that is not an expression of the legal right which would have been reserved to Mr Stewart as a consequence of his having reserved the mines and minerals. If that had been so, the legal right which he would, as a consequence of the reservation, have had would have been, as is said in a subsequent part of the deed,—full power to win and carry away the said coal, provided no injury shall be done to the surface of the ground. That would have been the clause if it had been intended merely to give expression to Mr Stewart's legal rights. Therefore this clause does not mean that, and the question arises, whether the true meaning and construction is not this, that the only restriction upon Mr Stewart's right—his full power to remove the coal—is that expressed, viz., provided this be done without entering upon the surface of the said lands. Now, if that is the only limitation, it comes to this, it would not exclude Mr Stewart from working the minerals, although it resulted in injury to the surface. That would, perhaps, be a forced construction of the deed if the deed did not have special clauses dealing with the matter of injury to the surface as a separate subject-matter therein dealt with by the parties, and it is also to be considered that the principal thing which could be injured by the letting down of the surface, namely, the mansion-house and the railway viaduct, are separately provided for. It is consequently less difficult to suppose that the parties really meant what this clause in terms expresses, viz., you shall have full power to remove the coal, provided only you do not do it by entering upon the surface of the estate. And this clause does not stand alone, because when we come to the next clause it throws a very strong light upon this one: it is, that the "disponee and his foresaids shall have right, should they find it necessary for the support of the said mansion-house and offices, or any of them, or for the support of the bridge or viaduct to be constructed on the said lands . . . that a larger quantity of coal should be left unworked than is contained in the said two portions of land, to purchase from me or my heirs and successors such additional quantity of coal as they shall find necessary for such supports, the price of which shall be calculated at the rate of £1000 per acre of wholly unworked coal." Now, it appears to me that that reservation, followed by the stipulation giving this right to purchase, clearly involves and assumes certain things as being the rights of parties. It assumes in the first place that the defender is to work the minerals, because if he did not work the minerals, if he never came nearer the reserved coal, there would be no danger of injury to the mansion-house or viaduct. It also clearly implies that the probable or possible or expected result of his so working the minerals was the bringing down of the surface. If it was not so, there would have been no necessity for Mr Hendrie stipulating that in the event of their approaching nearer the mansion-house or viaduct it might result in injury and might require the purchase of additional support. Therefore it appears to me that this clause assumes, in the second place, that the working of the minerals will in all probability be attended with injury to the surface. It also appears to me to assume, and necessarily to assume, that in so working the minerals to the injury of the surface the defender was doing so as a matter of right; because it is very difficult to suppose that Mr Hendrie would agree to pay the defender for not doing an illegal act, and an act which he had no power to do. And yet the view of the pursuers in this case is that if the defender so works the minerals as to injure the surface, and to injure the support to the surface, he is doing a wrongful act which he has no right to do; and yet upon the face of this deed he is to be paid at the rate of £1000 an acre for additional unworked coal when this is necessary to prevent danger to the railway or mansion-house from his mineral workings. That clearly indicates to my mind that the parties knew quite well that that was a perfectly legal act on the part of Mr Stewart.

Now, if that be so, let us see how that would apply to the interdict which is asked. Declarator is asked in these terms,—"It should be found and declared that the defender is not entitled to work," and so on, "the coal in such a manner as not to leave sufficient support for the pursuers' said lands above and adjacent to the seam or seams worked by him, and that the defender in working and winning any of the said minerals is bound to do so in such a manner as not to break, injure, or alter the level of the surface of the pursuers' said lands, or to cause disturbance or subsidence of any part of the said lands." Now, suppose we were to grant the interdict sought, what would be the result? The result would be this, that Mr Stewart, for stopping the working of the minerals, would not be paid the thousand pounds which Mr Hendrie consented to pay for the stopping of them. In other words, it would just be that the clause in the disposition by which that stipulation had been made should receive no effect whatever. I do not see any other result that could follow from it; because the contention on the other side is that Mr Stewart reserved nothing but the mere power to remove the coal, the surface being kept safe. If that be so, then they are entitled to interdict; if that be not so, if it be clear upon the face of this deed that there was a further power reserved to Mr Stewart to work and remove the minerals although it should result in injury to the surface, then it is clear that there was by this deed reserved to Mr Stewart something more than the legal consequences which result from the mere reservation of the rights to mines and minerals. And I say that that clearly shews that the parties to this contract had it in view that Mr Stewart was to have the right to remove these minerals although the result of his exercising that right might be to bring down and injure the surface. I can put no other interpretation upon this clause except to meet that reserved power on the part of Mr Stewart.

No. 189.

June 19, 1891. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

Well, now, if that be so, it appears to me that the right cannot be limited, as the Lord Ordinary suggests, to any part of the lands, because it is a reservation of a right and nothing else. Accordingly, the result which I have come to upon a consideration of the construction of this disposition is that by clear implication there is a right and power reserved to Mr Stewart to remove the minerals, even although the result should be to bring down and injure the surface. If that be so, the result is that at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, namely, that the defender is entitled to be assoilzied from this action. At the same time that is not the result of the construction of the deed which the Lord Ordinary has adopted. His Lordship has taken a different view from that which I have expressed as to the construction of this deed. But he has decided in favour of the defender upon grounds upon which, without going into them at any length, I regret to say I should not have been prepared to support the defender's case.

The first is that he holds that Mr Hendrie had discharged any right to support that he had by his acts and conduct in the matter. The Lord Ordinary puts very much stress upon this, that Mr Hendrie had himself taken a lease from Mr Stewart of a small part—some eleven acres—of the coals in question, by which he bound himself to work out the whole of that coal exhaustively, and with the necessary result of injury to the surface. But I think it would be very difficult to found any acquiescence on the part of Mr Hendrie from this. We cannot tell how the consideration for the lease which Mr Hendrie agreed to pay or Mr Stewart agreed to take may have influenced them in reserving rights in that matter, and I notice that while Mr Hendrie discharges all claims competent to him as proprietor of the surface of the said lands, it is only "in respect of any damages which may have been or may be occasioned by his operations under this lease." How, in the face of that reservation, which is a reservation only of damage caused by this lease, it could be said that there was any implied discharge of the right to support with reference to the whole other parts of the lands not touched by this lease, I have not been able to follow the Lord Ordinary. Then it is the fact that Mr Hendrie had allowed the defender to work the coal for some considerable period of years without stopping it, and had made a claim and recovered damages of considerable extent. I cannot see that because Mr Hendrie may have had the right to stop these operations, but let them go on for a considerable time, it may be without any loss or injury to himself, he has therefore lost the right to object to future workings, and I should not put much reliance upon that fact as being evidence that the pursuer, Mr Hendrie, had discharged his right. And I do not think there is any evidence of such an expenditure of money by the defender as is suggested. It is to be noticed that the expense of sinking the pits was altogether on ground with which Mr Hendrie had nothing to do. They were sunk in Calderbank, which was Mr Stewart's own separate property, and how Mr Hendrie could have had any right or title to interfere with these proceedings, I am at a loss to see. Therefore, I do not think, with deference to the Lord Ordinary, that the case would be safely rested upon these acts as implying the discharge of Mr Hendrie's rights.

There is another and quite distinct ground on which the Lord Ordinary bases his decision for the defender; but I cannot be held as agreeing in regard to that either. It is this,—He says the pursuers are not entitled to interdict, because the loss which would result to defender by the stoppage of his works would be out of all proportion to any advantage which the owner of the surface could obtain. I confess it is new to me in the law of Scotland that a person's right, and in that view an undisputed right, is to be taken away because it would be for the pecuniary advantage of another person that he should lose it. It appears to me to be quite a novel thing in the law of Scotland, and I think the Lord Ordinary is under a misapprehension here. These considerations are most material, not when we are considering any matter of established right, but where the question is a question of interdict before the right is established. But the assumption on which the Lord Ordinary puts the case is that the right is established, and is to be taken away because it is more convenient for the defender and comparatively little pecuniary loss to the pursuers to lose their right.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the question depends entirely on the true construction and effect of the title now before us, and I am unable to agree with the view which appears to me to be suggested by the Lord Ordinary's observation, that that is a question which can be governed by previous decisions as to the construction of other deeds in different terms. We must ascertain for ourselves what is the true meaning and effect of this particular deed. Now, I entirely concur in the construction which Lord Adam puts upon it, and for the reasons he has given, and I think it unnecessary to repeat those reasons. I agree also with Lord Adam in thinking that if the title bore the construction which the Lord Ordinary puts upon it, it would not be possible to adopt the grounds upon which he holds that nevertheless the proprietor of the surface shall not be allowed to prohibit proceedings which will bring down the surface contrary to the right which he holds to be established in him. I agree with Lord Adam that the grounds upon which the Lord Ordinary proceeds are not satisfactory, but I think the result at which he has arrived is right.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with your Lordships in adhering. With regard to the question which the Lord Ordinary discusses under the third branch of his note, it appears to me that there is no evidence of acquiescence at all, and that the view his Lordship takes upon the authority of Professor Bell in his Principles is not justified by the text of the section to which he refers. I also agree with Lord Adam in thinking that for the Court to abstain from enforcing a right because that enforcement would cause great inconvenience or pecuniary loss to somebody else is a doctrine which is quite unknown to the law of Scotland.

No. 189. June 19, 1891. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and of new assoilzied the defender.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—DRUMMOND & REID, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 190. June 19, 1891. W. N. White & Co., Limited, v. Dougherty.

W. N. WHITE & COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Appellants).—Clyde. JAMES DOUGHERTY, Defender (Respondent).—Shaw.

Sale—Auction—Exhibition of printed conditions of sale—Sale by sample or by bulk.—The purchaser of certain cases of apples, at a sale of apples by auction, having rejected the apples as being disconform to sample, the auctioneer brought an action against him for the price, denying that the sale was by sample, and founding on the following condition, which he averred was one of the conditions of the sale;—"3. Goods to be delivered to the purchaser as they now lie, with all faults and defects, without any allowance for inaccurate description of marks, quality, quantity, or condition, and intending buyers are requested to thoroughly inspect the bulk."

From a proof it appeared that printed conditions of sale, including that above quoted, were hung up in front of the auctioneer's rostrum, but the auctioneer neither read the conditions out to those attending the sale nor directed their attention to them. The defender deponed that he had not read the conditions, though in his evidence he did not dispute that he knew of them. The apples in bulk were stored in cases in a cellar underneath the auction-room, and the auctioneer's cellarman took six of these cases at random, and having opened them, placed them on a dais in the auction-room in sight of those attending the sale. The auctioneer referred to these six open cases as containing specimens of the apples for sale. The defender discovered on delivery that most of the apples he had bought were much decayed.

Held that the sale was not a sale by sample, that the condition above quoted applied, and imposed on the defender the duty of satisfying himself as to the condition of the apples in bulk, and therefore that decree fell to be granted as concluded for.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. C.

ON 30th August 1890 W. N. White & Company, Limited, fruit-brokers, Covent Garden, London, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow under the Debts Recovery Act, against James Dougherty, fruit-merchant, Glasgow, for £39, 5s., as the price of certain cases of Tasmanian apples which the pursuers had sold to the defender by auction at the Covent Garden Market on 11th June 1890.

The defender maintained that he was entitled to reject, and had duly rejected, the apples as being disconform to sample.

The pursuers averred that the sale was a sale by bulk and not sample, and further, that it was conducted according to certain conditions which they stated had been exhibited in the saleroom, and in particular, according to the following condition,—"3. Goods to be delivered to the purchaser as they now lie, with all faults and defects, without any allowance for inaccurate description of marks, quality, quantity, or condition, and intending buyers are requested to thoroughly inspect the bulk."

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect,—A public sale of apples was held by the pursuers in Covent Garden Market on the day in question, and a large quantity of apples was sold on that occasion. Among the sales was the lot sold to the defender. The apples

No. 190.

June 19, 1891.
W. N. White & Co., Limited, v. Dougherty.

had arrived from Tasmania in steamers, which had refrigerators on board, so as to keep the apples fresh. According to the custom of trade in Covent Garden Market, the apples in bulk are placed in the cellar underneath the market, and a certain number of cases is placed on a dais in front of the intending purchasers. These cases are selected from the bulk by the auctioneer or his deputy, and they are open, and the apples are visible to the offerers. The auctioneer refers to them as being specimens of the apples to be sold. The sale is conducted under certain printed conditions, which are not read out, but which are hung up in front of the auctioneer's rostrum. They are known to be there, and to regulate the sale. At the auction on 11th June the sales to the defender were made in accordance with these customs. The steamer by which the apples are said to have arrived had discharged its cargo the day before the sale, and the bulk of the apples was placed in the cellar, and six open cases were placed on the dais as specimens of the apples in the cellar.* These cases contained good sound hard apples. The conditions of sale, which included the condition founded on by the pursuers, were not read out, nor did the defender read them for himself. He deponed, however, that the condition in question was a common one throughout the three kingdoms, and that he himself sold fruit every day on the same conditions. After the sale the defender received a delivery-order for the apples, and handed it to a carrier, and the carrier had them conveyed to Glasgow. On arrival in Glasgow, the greater part of the apples were found to be valueless as fruit, and the whole lot was sold judicially for £5, 1s. 2d.

On 4th December 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) assoilzied the defender, holding that the pursuers, by exhibiting the six cases of apples, had converted the sale into a sale by sample, and had thus rendered condition 3, founded on by the pursuers, inapplicable.

On 12th March 1891 the Sheriff (Berry) adhered on the same ground.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—There was no question that the conditions were exhibited in the saleroom, nor could it reasonably be disputed that the defender knew that they were so exhibited, and also what they contained—in substance at least. At all events, he took the risk of remaining in ignorance, for it was well settled that the exhibition of conditions of sale in an auction saleroom made these conditions part of the contracts of sale concluded there.[1] The only question of difficulty was as to whether the exhibition of the six open cases of apples constituted the sale a sale by sample so as to prevent the pursuers from taking advantage of the third condition. Now, the true meaning of shewing these six

---

* George Gardiner, cellarman with the pursuers, deponed,—"The cases are never opened downstairs, and I cannot speak as to the state of the apples. They are never picked. I just send them up as they come."

W. N. White, the pursuer's managing director, deponed,—"My reason for getting up the specimens was to shew the kind of fruit for sale. I had every reason to believe that the bulk was according to the sample, and I knew nothing to the contrary. We are silent as to the guarantee. The buyers use their own judgment in buying the apples. . . . I never see them before the sale. So far as I can remember, I did not say the apples were in prime condition. I did not see them before they were opened. I always recommend my goods when selling them, as auctioneers generally do."

Elias Rosenberg, fruiterer, London, who attended the sale, deponed,—"When the six or eight cases of apples referred to were opened, Mr White said—'Here is a fine parcel of apples.'"

[1] Hain v. Laing, May 21, 1853, 15 D. 667, 25 Scot. Jur. 405; Macdonald & Fraser v. Henderson, Nov. 3, 1882, 10 R. 95; Byewater v. Richardson, May 24, 1834, 1 Ad. and Ellis, 508.

No. 190.

June 19, 1891.
W. N. White & Co., Limited, v. Dougherty.

cases was to give possible purchasers a convenient opportunity of judging of what was for sale without having to go down to the cellars to inspect the bulk; but they might do that if they pleased. In a popular sense these six cases might be called "samples" of the bulk, but a sale by sample was another matter. It was a sale on the express or implied warranty that the thing sold should correspond to a specimen or part of it exhibited; and such a warranty would not be implied from the mere exhibition of a specimen or part.[1] That was a fortiori true in the present case, where printed conditions of sale were exhibited, one of which was inconsistent with a sale by sample. Such a sale not being a written contract, it was not incompetent to prove by parole that the auctioneer had announced his intention to depart from his printed conditions, but the onus on anyone alleging such a departure was an exceedingly heavy one.[2] Here there was nothing in the proof to suggest that the pursuers so referred to the six cases as being in a legal sense samples of the rest.

Argued for the defender;—The mere exhibition of printed conditions of sale in an auction-room was not enough to incorporate them into the sales. The auctioneer must read them at the beginning of the auction, or at least refer to them, and he had done neither here. But even if the exhibition of the conditions would per se have made them part of the sales, it was otherwise where the auctioneer's conduct was inconsistent with the conditions. Pro tanto the conditions were not conditions of the sale. Here the pursuers by exhibiting what were in fact samples of the apples, had shewn that they did not intend to stand on the conditions,—on condition 3 at least.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the pursuers are fruit-brokers in Covent Garden, London, and the defender is a fruit-merchant in Glasgow.

The subject of the contract between the parties was a number of cases of apples, and these were purchased by the defender from the pursuers at a public sale conducted by the pursuers in Covent Garden Market. Printed conditions of sale were posted up on the rostrum in the place of sale, and the third of these conditions ran thus,—"Goods to be delivered to the purchaser as they now lie, with all faults and defects, without any allowance for inaccurate description of marks, quality, quantity, or condition, and intending buyers are requested to thoroughly inspect the bulk."

The defender maintains that the sale did not take place under these conditions, but was a sale by sample, and that as the bulk was not conform to the sample, he is entitled to absolvitor. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have adopted this view, and have accordingly given judgment in favour of the defender, but I am unable to agree with them. It seems to me that this was not a sale by sample in any proper legal construction of the term, but on the contrary was a sale of goods in bulk, and that as regards the quality the purchaser was himself the judge, and must be held to have satisfied himself.

The doctrine of law on the subject is plain enough, and is thus stated by Professor Bell in the 98th section of his Principles, where, when dealing with the subject of implied warranty, he says, "In order to raise the implied warranty by sample, it is not sufficient that a part of the goods shall have been drawn and exhibited, unless it is expressly referred to in the bargain as such, and due precaution taken for identifying the sample." It appears to me that the facts of

[1] Bell's Princ. 98; Benjamin on Sale, 641.
[2] Christie v. Hunter, March 16, 1880, 7 R. 729.

No. 190.

June 19, 1891.
W. N. White & Co., Limited, v. Dougherty.

the case do not bring it within the definition of a sale by sample. I think that no due precaution was taken for identifying the sample, and it also appears that a part of the goods was "not drawn or accepted as a sample." The effect of the third condition, which I have already quoted, was to throw upon the intending buyer the duty of thoroughly inspecting the bulk. I do not think this can be viewed as a sale by sample, unless the pursuers had fraudulently exhibited samples knowing that they did not fairly represent the bulk; but no such case is suggested here. The doctrine has been somewhat silently, if I may say so, developed by Lord Ellenborough in the cases reported in 4 Campbell's Reports,[1] and his observations fully confirm the view of Professor Bell, who refers to these cases, and have been themselves confirmed and set up by subsequent decisions in the English Courts.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff is wrong, and that the pursuers are entitled to succeed.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the apples in question were purchased by the defender from the pursuers at a public sale conducted by the pursuers in Covent Garden Market; that the conditions of sale were posted up on the rostrum in such a way as to be patent to the defender and other buyers; that by the said conditions it was stipulated that 'the goods were to be delivered to the purchasers as they now lie, with all faults and defects, without any allowance for inaccurate description of marks, quantity, quality, or condition, and intending purchasers are requested thoroughly to inspect the bulk'; that samples of the apples in question were exhibited at the sale, but that the conditions of sale contain no reference to samples except such as may be implied in the said stipulation; and that the defender purchased and took delivery of the apples subject to the said conditions: Find in law that the defender is not entitled to reject the goods, and refuse payment of the price, on the ground that the bulk was disconform to the sample: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 4th December 1890, and of the Sheriff dated 12th March 1891: Repel the defences, and ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £39, 5s. as concluded for: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.

J. & A. HASTIE, Solicitors—JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 191.

June 19, 1891.
Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co.

SAMUEL BENNETT, Pursuers (Respondents).—J. C. Thomson—C. J. Guthrie.

THE INVERESK PAPER COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Jameson—W. C. Smith.

Foreign—Principal and Agent—Mercantile Agency—Title to sue—Foreign principal.—When a person enters into a contract in his own name for an undisclosed principal, the latter, on disclosing himself as principal, has a title to sue upon the contract, but is subject to all pleas which the defender could have maintained against the agent if the latter had raised the action.

Although there may be a general usage in the foreign trade which raises a [1] See Meyer v. Everth, 1814, 4 Camp. 22; Gardiner v. Gray, 1815, 4 Camp. 44.

No. 191.

June 19, 1891. Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co.

presumption that a British commission-merchant contracts as a principal and not as agent for a foreign trader, the presumption will give way to evidence that the commission-merchant is acting as agent for a foreign trader, and when this is so, the law of principal and agent will apply.

In an action at the instance of an Australian merchant against manufacturers in this country for breach of contract the defenders pleaded "No title to sue," in respect that the contract was entered into by them with a commission-merchant in London as principal.

Held on a proof that the pursuer had appointed the commission-merchant to be his agent, and that on disclosing himself as principal he had a sufficient title to sue the action.

Per Lord M'Laren,—"When all the parties are in this country, a seller to the agent of an undisclosed principal, when he comes to know the name of the principal, may elect to sue the principal for the price. But if he takes advantage of this right, he is disabled from maintaining any plea that would alter the relations of the principal and the agent to the disadvantage of the principal."

"A corresponding rule exists that a principal, if he has occasion to sue for fulfilment of a contract, may come forward and disclose himself, and may sue the other party in his own name. But he also, if he elects to sue in his own name, will be affected by any counter claims that might have been pleaded against his agent."

"If the seller knew who the principal was from the beginning, the election is held to be made at the time of making the contract, because the seller is bound to elect whom he is to take as his debtor as soon as he comes to know who is the principal to whom the goods are sold."

1st Division. Ld. Wellwood. C.

THE firm of Samuel Bennett, newspaper proprietors in Sydney, New South Wales, raised an action against the Inveresk Paper Company, Musselburgh, for certain claims, damages, and expenses alleged to have been incurred in respect of the defenders' failure to pack sufficiently certain consignments of super-calendered printing paper shipped to the pursuers.

The pursuers averred that the defenders had entered into a contract with the pursuers' agents, Messrs Thomas Poulter & Sons, London, to supply the paper to the pursuers, and to put it free on board ship at London or Liverpool at 20s. 8d. per ream, less five per cent discount. The paper was duly paid for, but on arrival at Sydney was found, owing to bad packing, to be damaged and spoiled.

The defenders in answer averred;—"Explained that the defenders contracted with Messrs Poulter & Sons, who were paper-merchants in London, and knew nothing about the pursuers of this action or that the paper was to be used by the pursuers in Sydney or elsewhere. The defenders' contract was to put the paper f. o. b. at London or Liverpool." The defenders further denied that the paper was insufficiently packed.

They pleaded, inter alia;—(2) No title to sue on the contract libelled. (3) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant. (6) The goods having been well and sufficiently packed in terms of the defenders' contract, and, separatim, having been accepted by Messrs Poulter & Sons at London, the defenders should be assoilzied.

On 11th December 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) before answer allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments "in regard to the constitution and nature of the contract founded on by the pursuers."

It appeared that the pursuers had appointed Poulter & Sons to be their sole agents and representatives in the United Kingdom by letter,* dated 10th December 1885.

* "To Thomas Poulter & Sons, 6 Arthur Street West, London Bridge, E.C.—I herewith appoint you my sole agents and representatives in the United King-

No. 191.

June 19, 1891. Bennett v. Invereak Paper Co.

Evidence was led upon the question whether the defenders were aware that Messrs Poulter & Sons had been acting as agents for the pursuers. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that it was made out that the defenders, through Oldham, their London agent, knew that the paper was ordered for Samuel Bennett, and was to be sent to Sydney. The First Division held that it did not appear from the proof that the pursuers were known to be principals at the time when the first orders were given to the defenders, but it was proved that they came to know it afterwards.

On 30th March 1891 the Lord Ordinary repelled the second and third pleas in law for the defenders, and before further answer on the remaining pleas (upon the merits) allowed parties a proof of their respective averments except in so far as covered by the proof already allowed and led.*

---

dom for the term of 5 (five) years from Jany. 1st, 1886, for the purchase and forwarding of all papers, machinery, type, and other merchandise of every description which I may require to be bought or shipped in or through the United Kingdom, and for the transaction of all my business generally, as per instructions which you may receive from me (or my firm) from time to time, at a commission of 1¼ % (one and a quarter per cent), free of all charge, said commission to be charged on the net amount of each invoice, and to be added to same, together with all disbursements. My impression is that the net amount of business will always exceed £40,000 (forty thousand pounds sterling) per annum, but at the same time I cannot guarantee this, and so you are to be at liberty to determine this agreement at any time by giving me 6 (six) months' notice of such your wish. It is an understood thing that you will always secure for me the lowest market prices and freights to the best of your ability, and that you will give me credit for all trade and cash discounts and commissions allowed by makers off purchases, and also the primage allowed off freights. In consideration of my appointing you for the term of five years, you agree to send me all makers' and shipbrokers' original documents and receipts, shewing discounts and deductions (if any), and also to keep me well posted up in all business matters coming under your notice, and which may in your opinion be useful to me or necessary for me to know. You will be at liberty to send me forward at any time sample lots (in each case as small as the makers can make to advantage) of anything which in your opinion will be to my advantage to see and try. You will also be at liberty to telegraph to me, at my cost, anything which you consider of necessary importance, at all times taking care not to make use of this permission without due and careful consideration. My bankers in London will have instructions to negotiate all documents which you may present to them on my behalf, and which are accompanied by the usual shipping and insurance documents customarily required by Colonial banks in London. I. BENNETT."

* "OPINION.— . . . The proof allowed was confined to evidence calculated to throw light upon the question of title to sue. I shall have to examine it somewhat in detail hereafter, but at present it is sufficient to state that the following facts are clearly proved or admitted. So far as appears on the face of the letters forming the contract, and the accounts, memoranda, invoices, and receipts, the pursuers' firm is not named, and the contract was entered into and payments were made thereunder by Poulter & Sons in their own name. On the other hand, it is proved that in the transaction Poulter & Sons acted merely as agents for the pursuers, under a letter of appointment, dated 10th December 1885. By that letter Samuel Bennett appointed Poulter & Sons to be his sole agents and representatives in the United Kingdom, for the term of five years, for the purchase and forwarding of all papers, machinery, type, and other merchandise, which he might require to be bought or shipped in the United Kingdom. Poulter & Sons were taken bound to secure the lowest market prices and freights, and to give Bennett credit for all trade and cash discounts and commissions allowed by makers off purchases, and also the primage allowed off freights.

No. 191.

June 19, 1891.

Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—By the law of England in contracts between a seller in England and a foreign undisclosed principal, who

---

On the other hand, they were to receive a commission of 1½ per cent free of all charge, said commission to be charged on the net amount of each invoice and to be added to same, together with all disbursements; and Bennett undertook to instruct his bankers in London to negotiate all documents which his agents might present to them on his behalf, accompanied by the usual shipping and insurance documents customarily required by Colonial banks in London.

"If these were the whole of the material facts in the case, it would simply be one in which an agent contracts in his own name on behalf of an undisclosed principal, the principal being resident abroad.

"I. I shall first consider how the pursuers' title to sue would stand on that footing according to the law of Scotland.

"If all the parties had been resident in this country the law would have stood thus,—The pursuers, the undisclosed principals, would have been entitled to sue the defenders on their (the pursuers'), agents' contract, the defenders, however, being entitled to maintain in defence any pleas which they could competently have stated had the action been raised by the agent. On the other hand, the defenders, if they had had occasion to do so, as for instance on the bankruptcy of the pursuers' agent, might have sued the pursuers on the contract when disclosed, although when they entered into it they only knew of and gave credit to the agent. In such a case the agent binds himself, but does not free his principal. This shews that in some cases both principal and agent may be bound (subject always to the other contracting party electing which of the two he will sue to judgment), notwithstanding that there is not, and cannot be, what is called 'privity of contract' between the principal while undisclosed and the other contracting party when the contract is entered into. It also supports the view of those jurists who hold that the question of liability or title to sue on a contract cannot always be solved by considering to whom credit was given; but that it depends, at least in some cases, on the scope of the mandate.

"The defenders, however, maintain that the pursuers are not entitled to sue on the contract, because they are resident abroad. They maintain that this being so, Poulter & Sons had no authority to bind the credit of the pursuers, and that there was no privity of contract between the latter and the defenders.

"In considering this defence, it is material to see precisely what the question is and how it arises. The question simply is, whether the defenders are to be sued by the pursuers, or by their agents Poulter & Sons—the defences on the merits being precisely the same in either case. There is no question here as to the liability of the agents. The defenders have been paid the price of the paper, and have therefore no interest to hold Poulter & Sons liable. Again, they are being sued in the Courts of their own country, and the pursuers have been obliged to sist a mandatary. The defenders, therefore, have no interest on that ground to object to the pursuers' title. Lastly, it is not disputed that, if the true view of the evidence is that Poulter & Sons were acting for an undisclosed principal, the defenders will be entitled to all the defences which they could have used if Poulter & Sons had been pursuers of the action. They will, in any view, be entitled to maintain any defences which arise on the terms of their contract, such as that their responsibility ceased on their delivering the goods f.o.b. in London. It will thus be seen that the question is purely technical, viz., Whether the pursuers, for whom the contract was made, or their agents in whose names it was made, should stand pursuers in the action?

"It is true that certain modifications have been recognised in the law of Scotland of the rules which regulate the rights and liabilities of principal and agent to and against third parties in cases where the principal is resident abroad. But I think the import of the authorities, and especially of the opinions of the Judges in the leading case of Millar v. Mitchell, 22 D. 833, amounts only to this, that the fact that the principal is a foreigner is an element the weight to be given to which depends upon the circumstances of each case and the way in which the had bought through the medium of a commission-agent in England, there was a general rule or strong presumption in fact and law that the latter question arises. There is no presumption of law by the law of Scotland that the home agent has no authority to bind, and does not bind his foreign principal. The majority of the consulted Judges in that case affirm the proposition that 'the natural rule in a contract of sale seems to be that the person whose goods are sold, and who is in the end to receive the price, shall be esteemed the seller; and that he by whose desire, and for whose benefit the goods are purchased, shall be esteemed the buyer, though both parties transact through agents.'

"After specifying certain exceptions, they decline to recognise as an additional exception the case where the disclosed principal is abroad. They say,—'It thus appears that the presumption arising from the fact of the principal being a foreigner is nothing more than a presumption of fact. It is a presumption which will constantly vary with the varying circumstances of each particular case. . . . The presumptions in all such cases, weaker or stronger, as the circumstances may be, are all mere presumptions of fact; and presumptions of fact are nothing else than pieces of evidence. The legal relations between the parties and the onus of proof remain in all cases the same. There is no presumption of law against the agent of a foreign principal more than against the agent of any other party.'—Opinion of consulted Judges, 22 D. 845.

"The reported cases in Scotland, including Millar v. Mitchell, in which the question has arisen, have been cases in which an attempt has been made to fix the home agent with personal liability. They were cases in which the agent contracted factorio nomine for a disclosed principal, and therefore would not have been personally liable if the principal had not been a foreigner. But the question has been treated as one of degree; and even in such cases it has been held that less weight is to be given to the fact where the agent is a selling and not a purchasing agent.

"Where, however, an agent contracts in his own name for an undisclosed principal it seems to me that there is no reason why the rights and liabilities of parties should not be the same whether the principal is a foreigner or not. In either case the party contracting with the agent is entitled to elect to sue the agent if he finds it for his advantage to do so.

"Again, if the undisclosed principal comes forward and sues on the contract the other party can plead any equitable defence which he could have maintained against the agent. Where there is no question as to the agent's liability, and where, as here, the one contracting party has been paid in full and no prejudice is averred, I see no room for any modification of the common law right of the principal, when disclosed, to sue on the contract made for him by his agent. As in a question between the pursuers and Poulter & Sons, there is no doubt that the latter were simply agents, and being so were bound to cede to their principals, without the necessity of a formal assignation, all contracts made on their behalf. This follows from the principles of the law of mandate which have been adopted in our law. Therefore, taking the simplest view of the pursuers' rights, they are entitled at least to the privileges of assignees, the defenders, on the other hand, being entitled, if they contracted with Poulter & Sons in ignorance of their true position, to state any equitable defences which they might have pleaded against the latter.

"It was strongly contended by the defenders that there is conclusive authority in the law of England to the effect that a foreign principal is not entitled to sue. For instance, in the fifth edition of Pollock's Principles of Contract (1889), p. 97, the import of recent decisions is stated thus:—'When the agent is dealing in goods for a merchant resident abroad it is held, on the ground of mercantile usage and convenience, that without evidence of express authority to that effect the commission-agent cannot pledge his foreign constituent's credit, and therefore contracts in person.' Again in the fourth edition of Benjamin on Sale (1888), p. 206, the import of the cases is stated by the editors to the same effect, and they add:—'This apparent exception to the rule arises from the peculiar character of the relationship existing between the commission-agent

No. 191.
June 19, 1891.
Bennett v. Invereak Paper Co.

acted as an independent contracting party in the transaction. The great inconvenience which would result if there was privity of contract estab-

and his foreign constituent, a relationship which for some purposes is treated as one, or analogous to one, of vendor and vendee.'

"Now, in the first place, the law thus stated was not recognised by the Court in the case of Millar v. Mitchell, although they had fully before them all the English authorities at that date (1860) as to the presumption alleged to be drawn from custom or the usages of trade. On this point Lord Curriehill says (p. 850),—'Nor is it proved that the doctrine has been founded on the usage of Scotland. If there were such usage it would have manifested itself by a clear test, inasmuch as the commission on such agency business, when the agents guaranteed the fulfilment of the contracts, would of course be increased in proportion to the increase of the risk, for the same reason that a del credere commission is payable when an agent guarantees to his constituent the performance of the factorial contracts by the other contracting party. But it is not proved, nor even alleged, that there is such usage in Scotland.

"'Nor does it appear from the authorities in the law of England, if I rightly understand them, that there is now any such exception in that country to this general rule of the law of principal and agent.'

"I do not find either in that case, or in later Scotch cases, any countenance given to the view that for such purposes the home commission-agent stands in the position of vendor to his foreign principal. That question was incidentally referred to in the recent case of Delaurier v. Wylie, 17 R. 167, November 30, 1889. I refer particularly to Lord Kyllachy's opinion on p. 191. I agree in the views which he there expresses on that subject, although I differed from him in the result on the question (as to the cargo of iron) with which he is there dealing.

"But further, I find that the cases which are quoted as the authorities for those statements of the law, or at least as settling the law, are all of recent date, the judgment of the Court being pronounced in at least three cases by the same eminent Judge, Justice, afterwards Lord, Blackburn. The cases in question are as follows:—Armstrong v. Stokes, 1872, L. R., 7 Q. B. 598, 605, 41 L. J. Q. B. 253; Elbinger Actien-Gesellschaft v. Claye, 1873, L. R., 8 Q. B. 313; Hutton v. Bullock, 1873, ib. 331, affirmed 9 Q. B. 572; New Zealand Land Company v. Watson, 1881, 7 Q. B. D. 374, 50 L. J. Q. B. 433.

"I have not been referred to any case in which the House of Lords has endorsed the law thus broadly laid down; and there are indications in later cases and in text books on the law of principal and agent, that even in England that statement of the law is not universally accepted. For instance in Evans on Principal and Agent, 2d edition (1888), p. 524, the author says,—'Where the principal is a foreigner resident abroad there is no practical difference in the legal principles applicable. At one time it was contended that not only is the agent the person who is primarily liable, but that he is in general the only person liable. The true rule seems to be that although the agent does not prima facie pledge the principal's credit, evidence may be given to rebut this presumption.'

"Whatever may be the law of England on the subject, the case of Millar v. Mitchell has not been overruled, and is conclusive in this Court if it applies. While it decides that there may be cases in which to prevent prejudice to the home seller there will be held to be a presumption of fact that when the principal is a foreigner the agent pledges his own credit, it does not decide that there is any presumption against the foreign principal's right to sue on the contract when no prejudice is averred. In such a case the presumption, which is founded on equitable considerations, reaches a vanishing point, and no onus remains on the principal to establish his title to sue beyond proving the fact of agency.

"It may be that a change has taken place in the law of England since 1860, and it may be that the time has come for declaring and establishing in the law of Scotland that, on grounds of mercantile convenience and the usages of trade,

No. 191.

June 19, 1891.
Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co.

lished between the undisclosed foreign constituent of a commission-agent and the home supplier of the goods had led in England to a course of business by which it was understood as settled that the commission-agent could not pledge his foreign constituent's credit to a third party.[1] There was no reason why the same principles of mercantile usage should not apply in Scotland. Indeed, Mr Guthrie in his edition of Bell's Principles[2] had incorporated the English law on the subject into the text. The case of Millar v. Mitchell cited by the Lord Ordinary[3] was inapplicable. In it the agent had contracted factorio nomine, and his principal had been disclosed from the beginning of the transaction, and the whole course of dealing of the parties went to shew that they had not contracted with the agent at all. In the present case the contract was with Poulter & Sons alone, and it was not proved that the defenders knew that Poulter & Sons were acting as the pursuers' agents. It was straining the construction of the letter of 10th December 1885 to describe it as a letter appointing Poulter & Sons as agents for the pursuers. That letter contained no authority to pledge the pursuers' credit, and the stipulation that credit was to be given for trade discounts was only intelligible in the view of Poulter & Sons making a contract as principal in this country. In these circumstances the pursuers had no title to sue the action.

Argued for the pursuers;—The law of Scotland upon the subject was not doubtful where the parties resided within the jurisdiction. The seller to the agent of an undisclosed principal might elect to sue the principal for the price of goods supplied as soon as the principal was disclosed to him. On the other hand, an undisclosed principal, where he had occasion there is a general legal presumption that a foreign principal has no title to sue on his agent's contract. But if this be so the alteration in the law must be established by decision of the whole Court or of the House of Lords.

---

"II. Even if prima facie the pursuers have no title to sue, I think there is sufficient evidence to overcome any presumption there may be against their title. I cannot within the limits of my opinion analyse the correspondence in detail, and I shall therefore merely select certain parts of it to illustrate the view which I take.

"[His Lordship then proceeded to review the correspondence, and concluded thus:]—On a consideration of the whole of the correspondence, to which I attach much more importance than to the parole evidence on either side, I think it is made out that the defenders, through Oldham, knew that the paper was ordered for Samuel Bennett, and was to be sent to Sydney; and further, that when the claims for damages emerged they shewed that they did not regard Poulter & Sons as the only parties with whom they had to deal, but, on the contrary, that they knew and admitted that the pursuers were the parties whom they had to satisfy as to the packing of the paper.

"In those circumstances, I think that the objection to title must be repelled, and a proof allowed."

[1] Armstrong v. Stokes and Others, 1872, L. R., 7 Q. B. 598, per Lord Blackburn, p. 605; Elbinger Actien-Gesellschaft v. Claye, 1873, L. R., 8 Q. B. 313, per Lord Blackburn, pp. 317 and 318; New Zealand and Australian Land Co. v. Watson, 1881, 7 Q. B. D. 374, L. J., 50 Q. B. 433; Paterson v. Gandasequi, 1812, 15 East, 62, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 378; Addison v. Gandasequi, 1812, 4 Taunton, 574, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 387; Hutton and Another v. Bullock and Others, 1873, 8 Q. B. 331, affd. June 13, 1874, 9 Q. B. 572; Kaltenbach v. Lewis, 1883, 24 Ch. Div. 54; Ireland v. Livingston, 1872, 5 Eng. and Ir. App. 395, per Lord Blackburn, p. 408; Ex parte Miles in re Isaacs, 1885, 15 Q. B. Div. 39, per Brett, M. R., 42; Benjamin on Sale (4th edn. 1888), p. 206; Pollock's Principles of Contract (1889), p. 97.

[2] Bell's Prins., 9th edn., p. 219.

[3] Millar v. Mitchell, &c., Feb. 17, 1860, 22 D. 833, 32 Scot. Jur. 346.

No. 191.

June 19, 1891. Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co.

to sue for fulfilment of a contract made by his agent, might disclose himself and sue in his own name; but he would be affected by any counter claims which might have been pleaded by the seller against his agent.[1] There was no warrant to be found either in our law or in the dicta of the English Judges in the cases cited by the defenders to justify the proposition that there was a difference in the law applicable to the relation of principal and agent depending upon whether the transaction was one in the home or in the foreign trade. The cases of Paterson and Addison[2] had reference merely to the application of the principle that a seller is bound to elect whom he intends to take as his debtor as soon as he comes to know who is the principal to whom the goods were sold. In Elbinger's[3] case the principal had been disclosed from the first, and there was room for saying that the election had been made and the principal rejected. The dicta of Lord Blackburn in such cases as Armstrong and Ireland[4] only went to this, that in the law of England there was a presumption of fact, founded on mercantile convenience, that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the commission-agent contracted as an independent party and not as agent of the foreign trader. But here, assuming the existence of such a presumption in Scotland, the letter of 10th December 1885 shewed beyond all doubt that Poulter & Son's relation to the pursuers was in the strictest sense that of an agent to a principal. The pursuers were then entitled to disclose themselves and to sue the defenders for breach of their contract.

At advising,—

Lord M'Laren.—This is an action at the instance of a commercial firm trading under the name of Bennett, whose domicile is in Sydney, and who sue the Inveresk Paper Company on a contract arising out of an order by Bennett for a large quantity—I think 3600 reams—of printing paper. This order was given to or through their correspondents in London, Messrs Poulter & Sons. Messrs Bennett sue the Inveresk Paper Company for breach of contract, in respect that the paper when it arrived in Australia was found to be damaged, as they allege, through insufficient packing. One of the defences to the action is that the pursuers have no title to sue; and this defence is founded on a legal proposition which I think may be expressed in this way—that in all transactions between a seller in the home country and a foreign purchaser effected through a middleman, it is a presumption of law that the middleman contracts as an independent contracting party with the seller and the ultimate purchaser respectively; that as matter of law the intermediary is not and cannot be the agent of either party; or, as it is otherwise put, that in the foreign trade there is and can be no privity of contract between the seller and the buyer, unless they are in direct communication.

The Lord Ordinary on considering this plea thought it expedient that the facts relating to the sale and purchase of the paper in question should be investigated with a view to the determination of the question of title, and by interlocutor of 11th December 1890 his Lordship allowed a proof. The interlocutor reclaimed against, dated 30th March 1891, proceeds upon a consideration

[1] 1 Bell's Com., pp. 526, 527, 528, and 540; Millar v. Mitchell, &c., vide supra, p. 981, note 3; Delaurier v. Wylie, Nov. 30, 1889, 17 R. 167, per Lord Kyllachy, p. 191; Athya v. Buchanan, Oct. 22, 1872, 45 Scot. Jur. 16.

[2] Supra, p. 981, note 1.

[3] Supra, p. 981, note 1.

[4] Supra, p. 981, note 1.

No. 191.

June 19, 1891.
Bennett v. Inverenk Paper Co.

of the proof taken under that order, and in it his Lordship repels the second and third pleas in law for the defenders, being the pleas to the title, and before answer allows the parties a proof of their respective averments on the merits of the cause.

Before considering whether there be such a rule of law regarding foreign transactions as the defenders maintain, it may be convenient in a few sentences to review the general rules of the law of principal and agent in relation to questions of title to sue and liability to be sued. Supposing the parties were within the jurisdiction, I apprehend there can be no doubt that a seller to the agent of an undisclosed principal, when he comes to know the name of the principal, may elect to sue the principal for the price. But, if he takes advantage of this right, he is disabled from maintaining any plea that would alter the relations of the principal and the agent to the disadvantage of the principal. That qualification of the right of election is recognised in one of the leading cases on the subject, Thomson v. Davenport. I may here quote what Lord Tenterden says on the subject, as reported in Smith's Leading Cases, vol. ii., p. 402,—"I take it to be a general rule that if a person sells goods (supposing at the time of the contract he is dealing with the principal), but afterwards discovers that the person with whom he has been dealing is not the principal in the transaction, but the agent for a third person, though he may in the meantime have debited the agent with it, he may afterwards recover the amount from the real principal; subject, however, to this qualification, that the state of the account between the principal and the agent is not altered to the prejudice of the principal."

A corresponding rule exists that a principal, if he has occasion to sue for fulfilment of a contract, may come forward and disclose himself, and may sue the other party in his own name. But he also, if he elects to sue in his own name, will be affected by any counter claims that might have been pleaded against his agent. This qualification of the principal's right of action is very distinctly stated in Bell's Commentaries in a passage which was read in the course of the argument.

Now, the rule in question applies to cases where the principal at the time of the purchase is undisclosed; and it is plain enough in principle that, if the seller knew who the principal was from the beginning, the election is held to be made at the time of making the contract, because the seller is bound to elect whom he is to take as his debtor, as soon as he comes to know who is the principal to whom the goods are sold. That, I apprehend, was the chief point under consideration in the leading English cases of Paterson v. Gandasequi and Addison v. Gandasequi, also reported in Smith's Leading Cases. These cases were both concerning the same purchaser, and the claims arose out of the bankruptcy of his agent. Gandasequi was a foreign merchant who had come over to England to make purchases. Gandasequi accompanied his agent or commission-merchant to the wholesale houses in London, and assisted him in the selection of the goods. In the case of Paterson, the presiding Judge, on proof of the fact that Gandasequi was present at the time of the purchase and was made known to the seller, directed a non-suit, but on a motion for a new trial Lord Ellenborough (the presiding Judge) agreed with his colleagues that a new trial should be granted on the ground that it ought to have been left to the jury to determine on the evidence whether the London merchant had elected to take Gandasequi, or his agent in London, as the proper debtor in the account. In the other case, Addison v. Gandasequi, there was no doubt as to how the right of election was exercised, because Gandasequi's agent had been debited in the books of the seller from the beginning. The jury by their verdict affirmed that the agent was taken by Addison as his debtor, and the verdict was upheld. But, as I gather from the opinions of the learned Judges, these cases were not at all decided upon any theory that there is a difference in the law applicable to the relation of principal and agent, depending on whether the transaction is one in the home or in the foreign trade. In Paterson's case Lord Ellenborough, in stating the point, says,—"The question is, whether all this was done with a knowledge of the defendant being the principal. The law has been settled by a variety of cases that an unknown principal, when discovered, is liable on contracts which his agent makes for him, but that must be taken with some qualification, and a party may preclude himself from recovering over against the principal by knowingly making the agent his debtor. It certainly appeared to me at the trial that the plaintiffs knew of the defendant being the principal and had elected to take Larrazabal & Company as their debtors, or I should not have non-suited the plaintiffs; but as there may perhaps be a doubt on the evidence whether the plaintiffs had a perfect knowledge of that fact, it may be as well to have it reconsidered."

No. 191. June 19, 1891. Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co.

Lord Ellenborough there states the law in relation to this, which was a foreign contract, in terms which are substantially identical with what has been laid down in the Courts of England and Scotland with reference to transactions in which all the parties—buyer, seller and agent—were domiciled in Great Britain. Therefore it cannot be inferred from the report that it was the intention of the Court of King's Bench to proceed there upon any ground peculiar to foreign contracts. It seems to me that the point of this case was, that the principal was from the beginning known to the seller to be the principal, and therefore that his election had to be made, or might be made, at the time of the sale.

But it is contended against the interlocutor that by more modern decisions a rule of law has been established, that in all foreign transactions the broker or commission-merchant is deemed to be an independent contracting party and not an agent; and reliance is placed on certain judicial observations—especially those of Lord Blackburn—in the series of cases that were cited. The most distinct and probably the most authoritative statement of Lord Blackburn's opinion on this question is contained in the report of the case of Ireland v. Livingston (1872), 5 English and Irish Appeal Cases, p. 408, where his Lordship suggests that some of his colleagues had fallen into error from not having adverted to the usage of the foreign trade, and he says,—"It is quite true that the agent, who, in thus executing an order, ships goods to his principal, is in contemplation of law a vendor to him. The persons who supply goods to a commission-merchant sell them to him and not to his unknown foreign correspondent, and the commission-merchant has no authority to pledge the credit of his correspondent for them. There is no more privity between persons supplying the goods to the commission-agent and the foreign correspondent than there is between the brickmaker who supplies bricks to a person building a house and the owner of that house." Now, I can only read this passage, and those of a like nature which have been cited, as a statement by Lord Blackburn of what is known to be a general usage (not necessarily universal) in the foreign trade. For reasons of convenience, it is found better that the commission-merchant should, in such cases, contract as purchaser on his own account, and should resell to his correspondent abroad. The inconvenience resulting from entering into such transactions on the footing of agency is such that a practice has grown up under which the commission-merchant acts as an independent contracting party towards those from whom he buys, and to whom he sells. But Lord Blackburn never said, and I do not think he intended to say, that, if a foreign or colonial house chooses to appoint an agent in London for the management of its business, including the sale of its goods or the purchase of goods on its account, the law will not give effect to such an arrangement. To say so would be to place a restriction on the freedom of contract, which could not emanate from any authority other than the Legislature, and which is certainly not warranted by any legal principle that I have been able to discover in the judicial opinions to which I am referring. But I think perhaps this also may be inferred from Lord Blackburn's opinion, that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is a reasonable presumption of fact that the commission-merchant contracts as an independent party and not as agent for the foreign trader. In the absence of evidence, so much would be presumed: though we know that in other cases this very question has been made matter of inquiry by a Court or jury. Accordingly, if there had been no documentary evidence in this case defining the position of the London house, I should have agreed with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that it was a proper subject for inquiry by proof whether the London house acted as Messrs Bennett's agents or as merchants. But it appears to me that this matter is really not open to dispute, because if we refer to the letter constituting Messrs Poulter the agents of Bennett I think its terms are very clear. They admit of no other construction than that Poulter's relation to Bennett was, in the strictest sense, that of an agent to a principal. The letter begins,—"I herewith appoint you my sole agents and representatives in the United Kingdom for the term of five years from January 1st, 1886, for the purchase and forwarding of all papers," &c., "and for the transaction of all my business generally, as per instructions." Then it proceeds to set out that the Poulters are to be paid a commission of 1¼ per cent; the probable amount of business is stated; and it is left open to either party to terminate the agreement by giving six months' notice. Then there are provisions under which the Poulters are to give credit for all trade and cash discounts, and, in order that the Bennetts may see that their agents are acting fairly towards them, they are to be bound to send "all makers' and shipbrokers' original documents and receipts." I do not think it can be disputed that, as matter of construction, this is an appointment of Messrs Poulter as agents for the Australian house, and that all orders given in execution of the mandate given by this letter, followed by this special instruction, are to be regarded as orders given by Messrs Bennett through their agents.

No. 191.

June 19, 1891.
Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co.

In these circumstances it appears to me that this must be treated as an exception to what we are told on high authority is the general usage of the foreign trade. Parties may make their own contracts and are not bound to conform to usage, and as in this case Messrs Bennett have chosen to act through agents in London, the relations of these agents with the manufacturers from whom the paper was purchased must be subject to the known and settled laws of principal and agent. For these reasons I am of opinion that Messrs Bennett are entitled to declare themselves, and to sue the Inveresk Paper Company for fulfilment of their contract. It does not appear from the proof that they were known to be principals at the time when the first orders were given, but they certainly came to be known afterwards. That is a circumstance more material to the election of the vendor when the option lies with him as to which party

No. 191.
June 19, 1891.
Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co.

he will sue, and would not, in my judgment, amount to a limitation on the right of the purchaser, when he thinks proper, to declare himself, and to sue in his own name. As he will be affected by any counter claims or pleas pleadable against his agents, no possible injustice can be done to the Inveresk Paper Company. The objection is a purely technical one, and I am of opinion that it is not well founded in law.

LORD ADAM, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MACANDREW, WRIGHT, & MURRAY, W.S.—MENZIES, BLACK, & MENZIES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 192.
June 23, 1891.
Dowie & Co. v. Tennant.

PETER DOWIE & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Johnston—Sym.
ROBERT GRAY TENNANT, Defender (Reclaimer).—M'Kechnie—Constable.

Jurisdiction—Ownership of heritage in Scotland—Sale—Posting of conveyance.—In a petitory action in the Court of Session against a domiciled American, whom the pursuers averred to be the proprietor of heritage in Scotland, the defender pleaded no jurisdiction, averring that although he had been at one time the proprietor of such heritage he had sold it before the raising of the action. It appeared that in October 1889 the defender became proprietor of certain heritable subjects in Scotland; that by improbative missives, dated November and December 1890, he sold these subjects; that on 9th January 1891 he executed and on 12th January dispatched by post from America a conveyance of the subjects in favour of the purchaser; and that this conveyance did not reach the purchaser till after the service of the summons, which took place on 21st January. Held that as the transference of the subjects had not been completed until after the service of the summons the plea of no jurisdiction fell to be repelled.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. C.

ON 21st January 1891 Peter Dowie & Company, merchants, Leith, served a summons for payment of £150 upon Robert Gray Tennant, commission-merchant, Chicago, United States of America.

The defender pleaded;—(1) No jurisdiction.

The pursuers admitted that the defender, who was by origin a Scotsman, was at the date of the action domiciled in America, and the ground of jurisdiction averred by them was that he was proprietor of certain heritable subjects in Leith, to which he had succeeded in 1889.

The defender admitted that he had in October 1890 made up a title, by service as heir-at-law of his mother, to the heritable subjects in question, but he alleged that at the date of the action he had sold these subjects to a Captain John Parker; and he produced missives of sale between himself and Parker dated November and December 1890. These missives were improbative, in respect that one of the letters constituting Parker's acceptance was not holograph of or subscribed by him, but was subscribed by Agnes Parker, "for John Parker." The defender also stated (and the pursuers did not dispute) that he had, on 9th January 1891, executed a disposition of the subjects in favour of Parker. This disposition was posted in Chicago on 12th January to Dowie & Scott, S.S.C., Leith, who were acting for both seller and purchaser, but was not received by them until 23d January—two days after the service of the summons. Parker ultimately completed the purchase, and entered into possession of the subjects.

On 29th May 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the plea of no jurisdiction, and granted leave to reclaim.*

* "OPINION.—In this case I have come to be satisfied that the plea of no jurisdiction must be repelled.

"The question is, whether a defender, feudally vested in heritable property

No. 192.
June 23, 1891.
Dowie & Co. v. Tennant.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) If the missives had been probative, jurisdiction would not have been established against the defender, because by the contract to convey the right of the seller became a mere right to the price. The property could not have been attached by inhibition against the seller.[1] The Court would not arrogate to itself jurisdiction on this ground unless there was property attachable by inhibition, the foundation of the doctrine being that there was property which would be available to make the decree effectual.[2] Where there was a binding contract of sale, it would found jurisdiction against the purchaser, —bare apparency had been found sufficient,[3]—and there could not be jurisdiction both against the seller and the purchaser in respect of the same subject. Assuming, however, the informality of the missives, that did not affect the essence of the contract,[4] the right to take advantage of such an informality being personal to the party. (2) Apart from the missives there was the conveyance, which must be held to have been delivered before the raising of the action, having been posted on the 12th January.

The respondents were not called on.

---

in Scotland, ceases to be subject to the jurisdiction upon the execution of missives of sale not probative and not followed by rei interventus, but followed by the execution, but not delivery, of a disposition in favour of the purchaser?

"I am not able to answer this question in the affirmative. I consider that to do so would be to affirm that if this action had been directed against the purchaser he would have been subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts simply in respect of his purchase. Now, although the decisions have gone a considerable way in sustaining the jurisdiction wherever there is substantial ownership of heritable estate in Scotland, no case was cited to me where such substantial ownership has been held constituted by mere purchase not followed by actual conveyance. Certainly no case has occurred in which the Court has recognised improbative missives, not followed by rei interventus, or a delivered disposition, as operating a transfer of property for the purposes of jurisdiction.

"I recognise in the case of a completed sale the force of Mr Constable's able argument, founded on the impossibility of inhibition after such completed contract of sale, and, on the other hand, on the possibility after such sale of an adjudication and implement. I quite recognise the force of that argument, and I by no means express an opinion adverse to it. All I say is that there is no decision which has as yet gone so far. But here I do not consider that the question suggested properly arises at all. This is not a case of a concluded and binding contract of sale. The missives are admittedly improbative. There was therefore locus pœnitentiæ until the disposition was executed and delivered, and there being locus pœnitentiæ, the result of course was that neither party was bound by the documents which had passed.

"It is said that the disposition having been executed by the defender and posted before the raising of the action, addressed to the joint agent of himself and the purchaser, that constituted delivery of the disposition, and amounted to divestiture. But I am unable to hold that, at all events until the deed reached the hands of the agent, it was beyond the power of the defender. He might, for example, I cannot doubt, have countermanded by telegram the completion of the transaction. That being so, the case is just where I put it as a case of an unconcluded contract of sale not binding upon the parties, and therefore not sufficient to operate in any sense a transfer of property. . . ."

[1] Livingstone v. Macfarlane, July 27, 1842, 5 D. 1, 15 Scot. Jur. 101.

[2] Ferrie v. Woodward, June 13, 1831, 9 S. 854; M'Arthur v. M'Arthur, Jan. 12, 1842, 4 D. 354, 14 Scot. Jur. 129; Fraser v. Fraser and Hibbert, Jan. 14, 1870, 8 Macph. 400, 42 Scot. Jur. 190; Bowman v. Wright, Jan. 24, 1877, 4 R. 322.

[3] M'Arthur v. M'Arthur, supra.

[4] Walker v. Flint, Feb. 20, 1863, 1 Macph. 417, 35 Scot. Jur. 253; Elmslie v. Duff, June 2, 1865, 3 Macph. 854, 37 Scot. Jur. 457.

No. 192.

June 23, 1891.
Dowie & Co. v. Tennant.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears that the defender was by origin a Scotsman but is now a domiciled American. After he became so domiciled he succeeded to certain heritable property in Scotland, to which he made up a title by service as heir to his mother. If he still holds that heritable property the question of jurisdiction is at an end, because he is then proprietor of heritage in this country, and is accordingly subject to the jurisdiction of this Court. But it is alleged by the defender that he immediately proceeded to sell the subjects to which he had succeeded, and certain missives are referred to to shew that the sale was completed in December 1890. But these missives are obviously improbative, and there is no allegation of anything of the nature of rei interventus having followed on them. They must therefore be thrown out of consideration. The defender, however, further alleges that the property passed from him to a person in Leith by force of the delivery of a disposition of the heritable subjects. The state of the facts on that matter seems to be this: A disposition of the subjects was sent to Chicago, where it was signed by the seller, and dispatched with the view of being delivered to and accepted by the purchaser in Leith, but when this action was raised it had not reached the purchaser, and there is nothing to shew that even if it had reached his hands he would have accepted delivery, and if he had refused to accept delivery the defender would have had nothing to fall back upon but the improbative documents to which I have referred. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—The summons in this case was served upon 21st January 1891, and the question raised is, whether in point of fact the defender was at that date proprietor of heritable property in Scotland. That he had been so at one time is not disputed, but it is said that he had ceased to be so by virtue of certain missives of sale passing between him and the alleged purchaser in November and December 1890, followed by the preparation of a disposition which was sent out to America, where it was signed by him and despatched to his agents in this country, which, however, it did not reach until 23d January—two days after service of the summons. The question is, whether in that state of the facts the defender was still proprietor of heritable estate in Scotland at that date. I agree with your Lordship that the missives founded upon were entirely improbative, and I do not think they constituted any contract. No doubt they were followed by a disposition signed by the seller, but then it was never delivered, and until actually delivered into the hands of the purchaser it could have been recalled by the seller by telegram. Further, there was no obligation upon the grantee to take delivery unless he chose. I therefore entirely concur with your Lordship and with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question of jurisdiction depends upon the opinion we may form as to whether the defender continued to be a proprietor of heritage in Scotland, notwithstanding the missives of sale referred to followed by the disposition executed and posted, but which had not reached the grantee when the summons was served. I agree in thinking that the missives were informal and improbative, being neither holograph nor tested, and that they could not divest the defender of the property of the heritable subjects in question. The question of the posting of the disposition is a more delicate one. In all cases where something has to be delivered by one person to another in order to effect an alteration of legal rights, there is involved the consent of both parties as well as the outward act which is symbolical of the transference. Thus, where heritable property is to be itself delivered, as it may still be (infeftment by registration of the disposition being only optional), it is necessary not only that the seller or his bailie should offer the symbols of earth and stone, but also that the purchaser or his procurator should accept delivery. It would not do for the seller's bailie merely to heave a clod at the purchaser's agent. The same principle applies in the case of the delivery of deeds. No doubt after posting the post-office is in most cases considered to hold for the grantee, yet until the grantee has accepted there is no transference of the property.

No. 192.
June 23, 1891.
Dowie & Co. v. Tennant.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN LATTA, S.S.C.—ANDREW WALLACE, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 193.
June 26, 1891.
Millar's Trustees v. Rattray.

JAMES BURNESS AND ANOTHER (Mrs Millar's Trustees), First Parties.—G. R. Gillespie.
MRS JANE MILLAR OR RATTRAY AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—M'Kechnie—Graham Stewart.
ELIZABETH RATTRAY AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—G. R. Gillespie.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Legacy to children described as of a certain number—Postnati.—A testatrix directed her trustees to divide the free residue of her estate "equally among the children of my late brother A, of whom there are nine, the children of my brother B, of whom there are ten, and the children of my brother C, of whom there are seven, who may survive me."

At the date of the will B had ten children. Before the death of the testatrix three other children were born to him. All B's children survived the testatrix.

Held that all the children of B were entitled to share in the residue.

1ST DIVISION. C.

MRS MARY RATTRAY OR MILLAR died on 16th May 1889, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 29th December 1880, by the twelfth purpose of which she directed her trustees to realise and convert her whole estate into money, and to "divide the free residue equally among the children of my late brother Andrew Rattray, whose widow continues his farm at Portersize, County Kildare, Ireland, of whom there are nine; the children of my said brother John Rattray, of whom there are ten; and the children of my said brother James Rattray, of whom there are seven, who may survive me; and in the event of any of them dying leaving issue, such issue shall be entitled, equally among them, to the share which their parent would have received if alive; and in the event of any of the said children dying before payment without leaving issue, the division shall be made, as if they had not been born, among the survivors jointly with the issue of any who may have died leaving children, such issue always succeeding equally to the share which their parent would have received if alive, the original division to be in as many equal shares as there are children alive, or dead but leaving husband or wife or family, such husband or wife likewise representing the deceased member, either in their own right or for their children, and counting as one in the division: With power to my trustees to make such advances as they may deem suitable before the period of distribution (being the complete realisation and scheme of division of my whole estate, which shall be the period of vesting when not otherwise provided) to any of the said children, or to their father or mother respectively for behoof of all the members of a family jointly, if not stated in the receipt to be for anyone in particular, such advances to bear interest at the rate of five per cent per annum, so as to make all equal; but such advances to anyone who may die without leaving husband, wife, or family shall be held as vested at the time of payment and be regarded as special legacies."

No. 193.

June 26, 1891. Millar's Trustees v. Rattray.

At the date of the trust-disposition John Rattray, the brother of the testatrix mentioned above, had ten children in existence. Three other children—William, Jane Ann, and Richard—were subsequently born to him before the death of the testatrix, and these thirteen children of John Rattray all survived her.

After her death a special case was presented for the determination of the question,—"Are the said William Rattray, Jane Ann Rattray, and Richard Rattray entitled to participate in the division of residue?"

The trustees were the first parties; the second parties were the children of Andrew Rattray and James Rattray (brothers of the testatrix) or their representatives; and the third parties were the thirteen children of John Rattray (the remaining brother of the testatrix), together with their father, as tutor or curator for such of them as were pupils or minors.

The second parties maintained that William, Jane Ann, and Richard Rattray were not entitled to participate in the division of the residue; the third parties maintained that they were.

Argued for the second parties;—The gift to the children of John Rattray "of whom there are ten" was equivalent to a gift "to the ten children of John Rattray." Had the gift been so expressed a child born after the date of the will would not have been entitled.[1] Such a gift was equivalent to a gift to the children then in existence nominatim. The present case was a fortiori in favour of that construction, for it was not a gift to the children of a single family, but was virtually a direction to divide the residue into twenty-six equal shares, subject to the proviso that if any child or children predeceased the period of vesting without issue the number of shares was to be proportionately diminished; but the testatrix did not contemplate that the number of shares might be increased. This was not a case of falsa demonstratio, for the testatrix had accurately stated the number of her brother John's children in existence at the date of her will, hence such cases as Bryce's Trustee[2] did not apply; but even if the number had been inaccurately stated that would not have entitled after-born children to share.[3]

Argued for the third parties;—Where the gift was to children as a class, there was a strong presumption in favour of the admission of postnati children. Thus, where the testator contemplated an interim and also a final distribution of his estate, a child born after the interim, but before the final distribution, was held entitled to share in the final distribution though excluded from the interim distribution.[4] The period of payment was the period at which the number of the class was to be fixed. To exclude after-born children express words of exclusion, or at least words clearly implying an intention to exclude, were necessary. Here the parenthetical manner in which the reference to the number of each family was introduced shewed that mere description was intended. Assuming that the reference to number was not intended to limit the objects of the gift, a will was presumed to speak as at the death of the testator; hence the case was one of falsa enumeratio only, which could be set right by the Court.[5]

[1] Sherer v. Bishop, 1792, 4 Br. Ch. Ca. 54; Theobald on Wills, 3d edit. p. 228.

[2] Bryce's Trustee, March 2, 1878, 5 R. 722.

[3] Theobald, supra.

[4] Ross v. Dunlop, May 31, 1878, 5 R. 833.

[5] Bryce's Trustee, supra.

At advising,— No. 193.

June 26, 1891. Miller's Trustees v. Rattray.

LORD ADAM.—This special case raises a question on the construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Mrs Rattray or Millar. The question is whether William Rattray, Jane Ann Rattray, and Richard Rattray are entitled to participate in the division of the residue of the trust-estate. These three persons are children of John Rattray, a brother of the testatrix, and the state of the facts in regard to them is, that they were not born at the date of the settlement but were born before the death of the testatrix, and the question is whether on a sound construction of the 12th clause of the settlement they are to be held as included in the gift to the children of John Rattray. The 12th clause after providing for the realisation and conversion of the whole estate into money, directs the trustees "to divide the free residue equally among the children of my late brother Andrew Rattray . . . of whom there are nine; the children of my said brother John Rattray, of whom there are ten; and the children of my said brother James Rattray, of whom there are seven, who may survive me," and then follows a clause of survivorship which I need not quote. Now, it is maintained on the one hand upon the construction of this clause, that the words "of whom there are ten" in the gift to John Rattray's children are limitative words; on the other hand, it is maintained that these words are merely words of description. It is clear that a very little change in the phraseology would have put the matter beyond doubt one way or other. If the words had been "equally among the ten children of my brother John," that, I rather think, would have limited the gift to the ten children who were in existence at the date of the will; if on the other hand the words had been "of whom there are at present ten," that I think would have shewn that the reference to the number of the children was merely by way of identification, and not for the purpose of limiting the gift to the number specified. The question is, which of these two interpretations is the proper interpretation of the words as we actually have them? I am disposed to think that the latter is the sound interpretation. I do not think that the testatrix intended the words in question to have a limitative effect, and in reaching this conclusion I think it is quite competent to construe the words by reference to other parts of the clause. Now, we find that the testatrix gives her trustees power to make such advances as they might deem suitable before the period of distribution "to any of the said children, or to their father or mother respectively, for behoof of all the members of a family jointly, if not stated in the receipt to be for anyone in particular." That seems to me to throw considerable light on the question we have here to consider, for it shews that the testatrix was making a family settlement, for the benefit of the families of the brothers whom she names, and it seems to me to follow that she intended to benefit the whole of the children of these families, and merely mentions incidentally the members of which they happen to consist at the date of the will.

On the whole therefore I am for answering the question in the affirmative.

LORD M'LAREN.—This case is one of some difficulty, but on the whole I am disposed to concur with Lord Adam. A legacy to the children of A prima facie includes all the children of A who are alive at the period of vesting, whether they were born at the date of the will or not. A legacy to the n children of A prima facie is limited to the children of A who were in existence at the date of the will, and that, speaking generally, even where the testator has made a mistake as to the number of the children who were then in existence. In such a case, the reason why the children born after the date of the will are not allowed to participate in the bequest is not that we suppose the testator meant to exclude them, but that the testator has failed to express his intention in appropriate words. But it is so likely that a testator should intend to include children born after the date of the will that a Court will always lean to a merely demonstrative construction, except where the words of the gift are such that the reference to number necessarily has a limiting effect.

No. 193.
June 26, 1891.
Millar's Trustees v. Rattray.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The testatrix gives the residue of her estate to the children of her three brothers generally, and without naming any particular children. Now, where a legacy is given in general terms to a class of persons who are near relatives of the testator, it appears to me that such a gift is not to be narrowed so as to include only those persons of the favoured class who may be in existence at the date of the will, unless the testator has expressly, or at least by clear implication, disclosed his or her intention so to limit the gift. In the present case, the testatrix adds a statement of the number of which each family consists—"to the children of my brother John, of whom there are ten,"—and the question is whether from such a mere statement of the number we are to infer an intention to exclude children who may be born after the date of the will. Now, that does not appear to me to be a sufficient ground for limiting the otherwise plain words of gift to the children generally. I should have reached that conclusion even without the aid of the subsequent clause to which Lord Adam has referred, but that clause at all events seems to me to remove all ambiguity.

LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—LYLE & WALLACE, Solicitors—Agents.

No. 194.
June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

HEW CRICHTON AND OTHERS (Campbell's Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers (Reclaimers).—Asher—Crole.

LEVESON GRANVILLE ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, Defender (Claimant).—D.-F. Balfour—Blair.

LEVESON GRANVILLE CAMPBELL, Defender (Claimant).—Dickson—Salvesen.

ANN A. KENDRAY OR LAMBERT (Lambert's Executrix), Defender (Claimant).—Macfarlane.

CAROLINE D. M. JONES AND OTHERS, Defenders (Claimants).—G. R. Gillespie—Cosens.

Succession—Accumulation—Thellusson Act (39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 98).—Held that the Thellusson Act prohibits any accumulation after the lapse of twenty-one years from the date of a testator's death, although the time specified for accumulation may not commence till long after his death.

Succession—Rents of Heritage—Thellusson Act (39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 98).—In a trust-settlement the testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow the rents of certain lands during her life, and at her death to accumulate the rents for the purchase of additional lands till the death of the longest liver of certain nephews and nieces, and upon that event to execute an entail in favour of the heir of the body of his nephew L. C., whom failing, &c. The deed contained a declaration that notwithstanding the death of the testator's widow the trust should continue till all the trust purposes had been carried into effect, and "declaring also that the institute or heir of entail herein pointed out for the time being who but for the continued existence of the trust hereby created would be in possession of the said lands" "shall be entitled to provide and secure his wife and younger children who shall not succeed to the said lands" "in provisions of the like amount as if such institute or heir were actually in possession of my said lands."

No. 194.

June 30, 1891. Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

The testator's widow survived him for thirty-two years. In an action of multiplepoinding brought by the trustees to determine the right to the rents accrued since the widow's death, held (1) that the Thellusson Act applied so as to prohibit accumulation; (2) that the failure of the trust purpose of accumulation did not accelerate the date for executing the entail, as until the death of the longest liver of the testator's nephews and nieces it was uncertain who should be the institute; (3) that in the meantime each term's rent as it accrued belonged to the person holding at that time the character of heir-at-law of the truster.

Lord Young dissented from (2) and (3), being of opinion (2) that the settlement shewed that the continuance of the trust after the widow's death was directed merely for the purpose of accumulation, and that as that purpose had failed the direction to execute the entail became operative upon that event in favour of "the institute or heir of entail pointed out for the time being" as the heir-male of the body of L. C.; (3) that if the direction to entail was not then operative, the accruing rents formed part of the truster's heritable estate undisposed of, and were held by the trustees in trust for the representative in heritage of the truster's brother, who was his heir-at-law at the time of his death.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. M.

THE trustees of the deceased William Gunning Campbell, of Fairfield, Ayrshire, who died in 1857, raised an action of multiplepoinding to determine questions as to the right to the rents of his heritable estate after the death of his widow on 16th January 1889.

William Gunning Campbell left a trust-disposition and settlement under which the pursuers were trustees. He left no children. By the settlement he conveyed his whole heritable and moveable estate to the trustees, directing them to allow a liferent of Fairfield to his wife.

The third purpose of the settlement provided,—"My said trustees, so soon as convenient after the decease of the said Mrs Maria Anna Menzies or Campbell, and after the decease of the longest liver of my nephews and nieces, sons and daughters of my late brothers Charles Hay Campbell and Napier Campbell, shall execute a deed of entail of the lands and others before disponed, . . . and the said deed of entail shall be made and granted to and in favour of the heirs whatsoever of my body, and the heirs of their bodies, the eldest daughter or heir-female always succeeding without division, and excluding heirs-portioners throughout the whole course of succession; whom failing, to and in favour of the heirs-male of the body of my nephew Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell, eldest son of the late Charles Hay Campbell, . . . and the heirs-male of their bodies; whom failing, to and in favour of the heirs-male of the body of my nephew George Gunning John Campbell, second son of the said Charles Hay Campbell, and the heirs-male of their bodies; whom failing, to and in favour of the persons, heirs, and substitutes specified and contained or pointed out in" a certain deed executed by the testator's father in 1817.

By the fourth purpose the testator directed that his moveable estate should be sold, excepting the furniture, &c., "in my house of Fairfield, which my said trustees may, if they shall deem it proper and expedient so to do, hand over to the institute or heir of entail for the time to be held and retained for the use and behoof of himself and the succeeding heirs of entail," and the proceeds laid out and invested at once or from time to time in the purchase of such heritage as the trustees should think suitable for the purpose of being entailed as after mentioned, or upon heritable security, "all to be held and retained by them during the lifetime of my said nephews and nieces, sons and daughters of my late brothers Charles and Napier Campbell, and during the lifetime of the longest liver of my said nephews and nieces."

No. 194.

June 30, 1891. Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

The fifth purpose was as follows,—"In the fifth place, my said trustees are hereby appointed and enjoined, and they shall, from and after the decease of my said wife, and during the lifetime of my said nephews and nieces, sons and daughters of my said two brothers Charles Hay Campbell and Napier Campbell, and during the lifetime of the longest liver of my said nephews and nieces, retain and accumulate, according to their discretion, the free rents, interest, and annual produce that may arise during the period between the death of my said wife (or my own death, if she shall predecease me) and the death of the longest liver of my said nephews and nieces, from my said lands of Fairfield and others foresaid, herein specially described and hereby disponed, and also from the said lands and others hereby appointed to be purchased, and also from the said investments on securities of the monies arising from my personal or moveable estate, means, and effects appointed to be realised; and for the purpose of accumulation, my said trustees shall, if they see fit, and from time to time, according to their own discretion, lay out and invest the said free rents, interest, and annual produce arising during the said period between the death of my said wife (or my own death, if she shall predecease me) and the death of the longest liver of my said nephews and nieces, upon heritable securities, in their own names as trustees foresaid."

The sixth purpose was as follows:—"In the sixth place, upon the death of my said wife and of the longest liver of my said nephews and nieces, or as soon thereafter as conveniently may be, my said trustees shall call up and realise the monies invested on securities as aforesaid, in so far as not previously called up and realised, . . . and with the proceeds thereof, and with any accumulations of the rents and produce arising from my said lands of Fairfield and others, or from previous rents, interest, and annual produce as said is, my said trustees shall, as soon as they may deem it expedient and beneficial so to do, purchase in their own name, as trustees foresaid, such farther lands and heritages as they, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may deem suitable for being entailed, either along with my lands of Fairfield and others foresaid, or separately; and of which lands and other heritages so to be purchased by my said trustees with the monies arising from the produce of my said moveable estate, and from the various accumulations aforesaid, I hereby direct, appoint, and ordain my said surviving and accepting trustees, with all convenient speed, to execute a deed or deeds of entail, . . . and which foresaid deed or deeds of strict entail last hereby appointed to be executed by my said trustees shall be made and granted by them to and in favour of the heirs whatsoever of my body, and the heirs of their bodies, the eldest daughter or heir-female always succeeding without division, and excluding heirs-portioners throughout the whole course of succession; whom failing, to and in favour of the heirs-male of the body of my said nephew the said Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell, and the heirs-male of their bodies; whom failing, to and in favour of the heirs-male of the body of my said nephew the said George Gunning John Campbell, and the heirs-male of their bodies; whom failing, to and in favour of the persons, heirs, and substitutes specified and contained or pointed out in the aforesaid trust-disposition and settlement by my father, and thereby, and by the said disposition and deed of entail executed in implement thereof, appointed to succeed to the lands thereby directed to be entailed, and entailed accordingly; . . . . and it is hereby always provided and declared that notwithstanding the death of the said Mrs Maria Anna Menzies or Campbell, my wife, at whatever time hereafter, the trust hereby created shall, in so far as the same may then be unfulfilled, subsist and remain in full force and effect in the persons of the other trustees foresaid, aye and until the whole ends, uses, and purposes foresaid shall have been in all points fulfilled and carried into effect; and that from and after the death of the said Mrs Maria Anna Menzies or Campbell, any two of the accepting and surviving trustees foresaid for the time, or any one of them when their number shall be reduced to one, shall form a quorum for fulfilling and carrying into complete effect the uses, ends, and purposes foresaid; and declaring also that the institute or heir of entail herein pointed out for the time being, who but for the continued existence of the trust hereby created would be in possession of the said lands and estate of Fairfield and others, particularly herein described and hereby disponed, shall be entitled to provide and secure his wife and younger children who shall not succeed to the said lands and estate of Fairfield and others last above mentioned in provisions of the like amount as if such institute or heir were actually in possession of my said lands and estate of Fairfield and others last above mentioned in virtue of the said deed of entail directed to be executed thereof."

The rents of the testator's heritable estate were uplifted by the trustees and paid to the widow till her death on 16th January 1889.

The testator's brothers Charles Hay Campbell and Napier Campbell both predeceased him. They both left issue. His brother Alexander also predeceased him leaving issue. His immediate younger brother George Gunning Campbell survived him, and was his heir-at-law. His two sisters survived him.

George Gunning Campbell died in 1858. He left no issue.

The questions to be decided were (1) whether the Thellusson Act applied to the rents of the heritable estate from and after the widow's death in 1889?* and (2) to whom, if it did apply, and if the direction to accumulate these rents after her death was thereby made ineffectual, these rents belonged?

The fund in medio consisted of the rents between the widow's death on 16th January 1889 and the institution of the action of multiplepoinding on 26th April 1890 and was £181, 11s. 2d.; but the question raised necessarily regarded all rents between 16th January 1889 and the death of the longest liver of the testator's nephews and nieces who still survived.

The first of the two questions was raised by the claim of the trustees. They claimed the whole fund in medio as being bound under the fifth

* The Thellusson Act (39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 98), enacts,—"Whereas it is expedient that all dispositions of real or personal estate, whereby the profits and produce thereof are directed to be accumulated, and the beneficial enjoyment thereof postponed, should be made subject to the restrictions hereinafter contained, . . . be it enacted that no person or persons shall, after the passing of this Act, . . . settle or dispose of any real or personal property so . . . that the rents . . . thereof shall be wholly or partially accumulated for any longer term than the life or lives of any such granter or granters, settlor or settlors, or the term of twenty-one years from the death of any such granter, settlor, devisor, or testator," and "in every case where any accumulation shall be directed otherwise than as aforesaid, such direction shall be null and void, and the rents, issues, proceeds, and produce of such property so directed to be accumulated shall, so long as the same shall be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of this Act, go to and be received by such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed."

No. 194.

June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

purpose of the settlement to accumulate and invest the rents as directed by the truster.

Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell, of Fairfield, who was the eldest son of Charles Hay Campbell, the testator's brother, claimed the whole fund as being the testator's heir-at-law on the death of George Gunning Campbell, who died without issue and without having served, and alternatively as eldest nephew and heir-at-law of George Gunning Campbell, the immediate younger brother of the testator.

Leveson Granville Campbell, eldest son of the last mentioned claimant, also claimed the fund on the ground that there having been no heirs of the testator's body, he was "the institute in whose favour the said deed of entail falls to be made."

A claim was also lodged by Mrs Lambert, widow and executrix of Edwin Lambert, the last surviving executor of George Gunning Campbell, the heir of the testator at the time of his death. George Gunning Campbell had left a will in English form, which she maintained made Edwin Lambert, and herself as his executrix, representatives of the testator William Gunning Campbell both in his real and personal estate. She maintained that the fund in medio fell to be dealt with as heritable estate not effectually disposed of, and therefore becoming intestate succession to which she as in George Gunning Campbell's right was entitled. Alternatively she pleaded that if the fund fell to next of kin she was entitled to share therein as representing George Gunning Campbell in moveables. The other claimants maintained that George Gunning Campbell's will was ineffectual to convey heritage.

Claims were also lodged by Mrs Jones and others, the heirs in mobilibus of William Gunning Campbell the testator. They maintained that the fund in medio fell to be divided among them per stirpes, not as heirs in heritage, but as entitled to it on a plea of collation urged by them against Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell.

Certain claims were also lodged by persons claiming through several of the next of kin of the testator.

It appeared that after the lapse of twenty-one years from the death of the truster, and while his widow was still alive, his trustees brought a multiplepoinding with the view of obtaining a judgment as to the person in right of the interest of the personal estate after the lapse of that twenty-one years during which time these interests had been accumulated by the trustees.

In that action Lord Curriehill, by interlocutor dated 30th December 1879, decided that, in respect of the provisions of the Thellusson Act, it was illegal to continue the accumulations of such interest beyond the period of twenty-one years from the truster's death, and that the fund in medio was divisible among the persons who were the next of kin to the truster and his heirs in mobilibus ab intestato at the date of his death, or the representatives of these persons.

The interest of the moveable estate was paid in accordance with this judgment.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) on 6th December 1890, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds . . . (3) that the truster directed that the rents of his said estate should be accumulated until the death of the longest liver of his nephews and nieces referred to in his trust-disposition and settlement, and after their death that the deed of entail therein directed should be executed; (4) that as at the widow's death more than twenty-one years had elapsed since the death of the truster, the direction to accumulate the rents has now become illegal and ineffectual in respect of the provisions of the Statute 39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 98; (5) that the fund in medio consists of rents which have accrued since the widow's death; (6) that the truster has not effectually tested on the rents accruing between the widow's death and the death of the longest liver of the said nephews and nieces; (7) that the said rents are of the nature of heritable estate falling to the heir-at-law or his representative in heritage; (8) that the heir-at-law was the truster's brother George Gunning Campbell, who died on 3d May 1858; (9) that the right to the rents of the truster's estate illegally directed to be accumulated was an heritable right vested in George Gunning Campbell at the date of his death; (10) that said right was not effectually carried by his last will; (11) that his heir in heritage is primarily entitled to said rents and to the fund in medio: Therefore repels (1) the first claim of Hew Crichton and others, trustees of William Gunning Campbell; (2) the first claim of Mrs Ann Alderson Kendray or Lambert; (3) the claim of Leveson Granville Campbell; (4) the claims, so far as they are direct claims on the fund in medio, of the heirs in mobilibus, and of Mrs Mary Cuthbert, The Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, The Edinburgh Life Assurance Company, and Alexander Stewart, and decerns; and appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may be heard on the remaining parts of the case." *

No. 194.

June 30, 1891.

Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

---

* "NOTE.— . . . The questions raised are perplexing and complicated.

"1. The first question is whether the Thellusson Act applies. The facts are (1) that more than twenty-one years have elapsed since the truster's death, and (2) that there has as yet been no accumulation of the rents at all, because they have been paid to the widow. . . .

"The trustees contended that what the Act prohibited was an accumulation of the rents for a longer term than the period allowed—twenty-one years; and that the statute was not infringed so long as the rents had not been accumulated above twenty-one years; and that, as in this case there had as yet been no accumulation at all, the provision of the statute was inapplicable.

"It was contended by the other parties that accumulations became illegal whenever twenty-one years had elapsed from the truster's death.

"I am in favour of the latter contention, and against that maintained for the trustees. The question is, no doubt, important, and has not, I think, been deliberately decided in the Scotch Courts, although it has been involved in more cases than one.

"The evil against which the Act was directed was not only accumulation of rents, but postponement of the beneficial enjoyment—a mode of expression pointing, I think, to postponement immediately after the granter's death. The period of accumulation prohibited is a period in excess of twenty-one years from the death of the granter, and any accumulation directed otherwise is declared null. The words seem to point to the death of the granter as the period from which twenty-one years should run, otherwise the words 'from the death of the granter' have no meaning or object, and a construction of the statute which disregards these words seems inadmissible.

"The trustees maintained that the point had been decided in their favour in the case of Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell, 24th November 1877, 5 R. 248. In that case a truster who died in 1841 directed payment of certain annuities, and appointed his trustees, after the death of the annuitants, to invest a certain sum as a fund for payment of bequests to certain religious and charitable institutions, and to accumulate and add to the fund one-fourth part of the interest payable on it. The last annuity was payable at Whitsunday 1856, and after that one-fourth part of the interest was accumulated until Whitsunday 1877—thirty-six years after the truster's death—when a special case was laid before the Court by the truster's representatives. It was decided that the direction to accumulate was null from the expiry of the period of twenty-one years from the term of Whitsunday 1856—that is to say, after the expiry of the term of twenty-one years from the death of the annuitants. But it is to be observed that prior accumulations were not challenged, and the question put to the Court was only whether the direction was void as from Whitsunday 1877. The Court could,

No. 194

June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

The trustees reclaimed, and argued;—The Thellusson Act did not apply, for that Act struck at accumulation of income for a longer period and did, decide nothing else. Probably attention was not directed to the legality of prior accumulations, and I do not find that any of the Judges indicate any opinion on the point.

"The question was involved, and may have been decided, in the case of Ogilvie's Trustees v. The Kirk-Session of Dundee, 18th July 1846, 8 D. 1229. In that case Mr Ogilvie, who died in 1825, directed that a certain liferent should be paid to his widow, and he in effect committed to the charge of the kirk-session of Dundee at her death a sum estimated at £2000, with directions to accumulate the interest for one hundred years, and then to build and equip an hospital with the accumulated fund. There seems to have been a considerable amount of litigation in reference to this deed. The main question to which the report refers was whether the fund was heritable, and so not affected by the Thellusson Act, which did not at that date apply to heritable property in Scotland. The Court held that the fund was moveable, and found that the direction to accumulate was struck at by the Thellusson Act. It was also found that the rents struck at were carried by the trust-deed, and formed part of the trust-estate. There was no decision as to the time when the accumulation began to be illegal, but parties were appointed to be heard on the remaining points of the cause. Unfortunately, the case is not again reported. But I think it right to call attention to an observation of Lord Jeffrey, very favourable to the contention of the trustees in this case:—'To what extent,' his Lordship asks, 'are the accumulations good? They are said to be good only for twenty-one years after the death of the maker of the settlement. Here the maker of the settlement was old Mr Ogilvie, who died about twenty-one years ago. But I suspect that in this case the death from which the twenty-one years was to date was that of the survivor of the spouses, and that the widow's life thus came to be the rule.'

"These remarks were, however, I think, obiter at that stage of the cause.

"In Lord v. Colvin, 7th December 1860, 23 D. 111, the testator died on 18th June 1831, and, as I read the case, the whole accumulations of the personal estate were held illegal after 18th June 1852, and no one seems to have suggested that any part of the interest could have been legally accumulated beyond that date. But as considerable annual payments out of the revenue derived from the personal estate were directed or authorised to be paid to the truster's sons, one of whom survived until 1835, there must have been a considerable part of the revenue which had not at 18th June 1852 been accumulated for the full period of twenty-one years. But no question about such part of the rents seems to have been suggested either on the bench or from the bar.

"It has been expressly decided in England that the period of twenty-one years must be reckoned from the truster's death, and not from any later date, in the cases of Webb v. Webb, 1840, 2 Beavan, 493, and Attorney-General v. Poulden, 1843, 3 Hare, 555. It was objected that each of these cases was decided by a single Judge, and that the reasons of the judgment were not reported. But in Webb v. Webb the reasons of judgment appear sufficiently from the argument of the counsel (Bethel), which was overruled, and these cases seem to have been accepted as settling the law in England. The point was assumed in Nettleton v. Stephenson, 12th March 1849, 3 De Gex and S. 366, and the law is so stated in Hargreave on the Thellusson Act, pp. 113-158; Jarman on Wills, 4th ed. i. 304; and Lewin on Trusts, 91. M'Laren on Wills, i. 306, is to the same effect.

"On the whole, I am of opinion that the statute, according to its sound construction, renders illegal a direction to accumulate, such as to postpone the beneficial enjoyment beyond twenty-one years from the truster's death, and that, in this case, as the liferentrix has survived the truster for much more than twenty-one years, there can be no legal accumulations after her death.

"2. The next question is to whom do these rents, ineffectually directed to be accumulated, belong?

"That question does not regard only the rents which have already accrued, but the same principle must determine the right to future rents.

"On this question there have been two distinct classes of decisions,—in the than twenty-one years. But there had been no such accumulation. The widow was given by the settlement, and had enjoyed, the income till one class, where it has been held that there was a good gift of the estate, the revenue derived from which was directed to be accumulated, the direction to accumulate has been held to be a burden on the gift of the estate, and the person to whom the estate was destined has been held entitled to it, unaffected by the direction to accumulate so far as in excess of the period allowed; and in the other, where there has been no prior gift of the estate, the revenue directed to be accumulated has, so far as affected by the Act, been regarded as undisposed of, and as falling to the testator's heir in heritage or in moveables. To the former class of cases belong Ogilvie's Trustees v. The Kirk-Session of Dundee, 18th July 1846, 8 D. 1229; Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, 29th June 1877, 4 R. 962; Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell, 24th November 1877, 5 R. 248. To the latter, Keith's Trustees, 17th July 1857, 19 D. 1040; Lord v. Colvin, 1860, 23 D. 111; and Cathcart's Trustees v. Heneage's Trustees, 13th July 1883, 10 R. 1205.

"I have no doubt that this case falls under the latter class, and that the rents ineffectually directed to be accumulated fall, not to the heir first in the destination in the deed of entail directed to be executed, but to the representative of the truster, as estate undisposed of.

"This point arose and was decided by Lord Curriehill in the previous multiplepoinding brought by Mr Campbell's trustees in reference to the interest of the personal estate. In that case his Lordship repelled the claim of the presumptive institute of entail. I have been furnished with a copy of his Lordship's opinion, and I adopt his reasoning. His Lordship observes,—'If the only obstacle to making the entail had been the direction to accumulate the rents, and if it had been now absolutely certain that this claimant must be the institute in the deed of entail, his claim must have been sustained, on the authority of the case of Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees.' 'But this claimant is not in that predicament; the direction to accumulate is not the obstacle to the execution of the entail, and the entail cannot be executed until after the death of the longest liver of the truster's widow, nephews, and nieces. It is uncertain whether this claimant will be alive when that event occurs, and it is therefore uncertain whether he will ever be the institute of entail. The decision in the case of Keith's Trustees, 19 D. 1040, appears to me to meet the present question, and to negative this claim.'

"It was not, I think, maintained that the rents thus thrown into intestacy were of the nature of moveable estate. It was, on the contrary, assumed that the rents were heritable estate, and, as it appears to me, rightly so, because they really formed a part of the heritable estate of which the truster had not disposed, except by the conveyance of the whole estate to his trustees. It appears to me that they fall to the truster's heir-at-law, or his representative, and that the trustees must uplift them for his behoof. The heir-at-law is necessarily the person who held that character at the death of the truster,—that is to say, George Gunning Campbell, the truster's brother. He died on 3d May 1858, surviving the truster for only half a year. At that time the trustees held the estate for behoof of the widow in liferent, and it was impossible to tell whether this intestate heritable estate would ever exist. It would never have existed if the widow and the nephews and nieces had all died within twenty-one years after the truster's death.

"I did not understand it to be disputed that George Gunning Campbell was, when alive, the person in right of the undisposed portion of the heritage. But it was contended on behalf of Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell that his right had wholly lapsed, because he had made up no title to the truster, and had not possessed for three years on apparency, and that he, Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell, was entitled to pass him by, and to take up this part of the heritable estate by serving heir in general to the truster.

"I do not think that this argument was supported by any of the authorities quoted. The point is not, perhaps, in my view of the case, of much practical

No. 194.

June 30, 1891. Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

1889. The expression of the Act, "the term of twenty-one years from the death of any such granter . . . or testator," did not mean that the twenty-one years must of necessity be reckoned from his death. It meant that after his death there was not to be accumulation for over twenty-one years. In short, there being no common law rule against postponement, it fell to the other claimants to shew that the Act forbade any accumulation at all, beginning after an interval and not immediately on the testator's death. That was not a true construction of its words. There was no authority binding the Court to take a particular view. The English cases were judgments of single Judges.

On this point the other claimants argued;—On the construction of the statute it appeared that the twenty-one years must start from the testator's death, not from a period at a long interval beyond it. He was not to have power to tie up beneficial enjoyment for a long period after he died. The reasoning of the Lord Ordinary was sound, and was supported by the English cases cited by him. It would be unfortunate if the Courts of Scotland took a different view from that which the Courts of England had adopted on this point. These English cases had been accepted as settling the law by text writers.[1] consequence, but I am unable to concur in the argument. Of course, George Gunning Campbell did not, and could not, possess on apparency, because the trustees held the feudal title, and the widow enjoyed the rents; and I do not see how the heir could have been expected to expede a service in order to take up an heritable estate which had no apparent existence. The trustees held the whole estate, and, so far as it was not effectually destined to anyone, they held it as trustees for the heir-at-law, and he had a jus crediti in the estate so far as held by them for his behoof, which I consider vested in him without service—Gordon v. Harper, December 4, 1821, 1 S. and D. 185, more fully reported in Ross's Leading Cases, Land Rights, i. 499.

---

"Now, if this right to rents ineffectually directed to be accumulated was heritable estate to which George Gunning Campbell had a complete and vested right, I see nothing at all which converted that right to which he was entitled as heritable estate into moveable estate in his person. He took it as heritable estate, and I think it was an heritable right vested in him when he died.

"It appears to follow that the person primarily entitled to the fund in medio, and to the rents which may subsequently accrue until the entail falls to be executed, is the representative in heritage of George Gunning Campbell.

"On the pleadings, as amended, there are two parties who claim this character—(1) Mrs Lambert, and (2) Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell. Mrs Lambert claims in virtue of John Gunning Campbell's settlement, under which it is said that Edward Lambert, the claimant's husband, was the last surviving executor, and Edward Lambert's will in favour of the claimant Mrs Lambert. I have some hesitation in deciding as to the effect of these deeds, because there was not much argument on the point. But it appears to me that Mrs Lambert's title fails at its first step, for the reason that George Gunning Campbell's settlement is not conceived in terms which, at its date, were apt to carry Scotch heritable estate—Kirkpatrick's Trustees v. Kirkpatrick, March 19, 1873, 11 Macph. 551, June 23, 1874, 1 R. 37—and I am therefore of opinion that Mrs Lambert has instructed no right to this heritable estate, which therefore remained in hæreditate jacente of George Gunning Campbell.

"Mr Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell has now averred that he is the heir-at-law of George Gunning Campbell. I presume that is the case, but he has made up no title as his heir, and his averment that he is heir has not been in terms admitted.

"But assuming that he is heir of George Gunning Campbell, then I am of opinion that he is the person immediately in right of the rents as such heir, and not as heir of the truster. . . ."

[1] Theobald on Wills, p. 414; Jarman and Lewin as cited by the Lord Ordinary.

No. 194.
June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

On the other questions, and assuming the first question to be decided, as the Lord Ordinary had done, it was argued for the testator's next of kin;—The Lord Ordinary dealt with the claim to these rents as a claim under the trust. But it was intestate, undisposed of heritable succession. That distinguished the case from Gordon v. Harper, cited by the Lord Ordinary. It was a real right to the estate itself, passing directly from the deceased to the heir, and never vesting in the trustees or passing through them at all. The heir did not require to make any claim against the trustees. Hence his right was not a jus crediti. All that had not been given to the trustees remained in the truster and passed on his death to his heir,[1] who would be bound to collate with the heirs in mobilibus, as he had already taken a share of the moveables.

Argued for Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell (the truster's nephew);—The estate in question was heritable. Under the directions of the trust it was still impossible to say who would be the institute. The rents, of which the testator could not debar beneficial enjoyment, must therefore go to this claimant as existing heir-at-law of the testator, or, at all events, as the Lord Ordinary had found, as heir of George Gunning Campbell, who was the truster's heir when he died. George Gunning Campbell's settlement could not convey them, because it was not habile to carry heritage. Leveson Granville Campbell had no vested right.

Argued for Leveson Granville Campbell;—The rents in question fell to him as institute of the entail if it were now made. The question was not one as to vested right, but of the application of the Act to the circumstance of the trust. The institute of the entail took the rents, defeating only the heir ab intestato. The principle of the case of Combe v. Hughes applied.[2] Smyth's Trustees,[3] must be admitted to be somewhat inconsistent with that case, but Combe's case was approved in Mackenzie's case.[4]

Argued for Mrs Lambert;—The Lord Ordinary was right in holding that George Gunning Campbell had a jus crediti in the rents in question, which vested in him as heritage. But that being so it became moveable estate in his person, because the rents were moveable in the hands of the owner of land. It was unnecessary for George Gunning Campbell to serve heir. The whole estate was given to the testator's trustees. No radical right could be said to remain in the truster to take rents which happened subsequently to accrue.[5]

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The truster was survived by his widow for thirty-two years, and therefore, on the assumption that the Thellusson Act annuls any direction to accumulate beyond the term of twenty-one years from his death (in the meaning of the word "from" adopted by the Lord Ordinary), the direction to accumulate rents of land subsequent to the widow's death (and we are here concerned with no other) must be regarded as void. The rents received by the trustees from the widow's death on 16th January 1889 to the date of the action (26th April 1890), amounting to £181, 11s. 2d., constitute the fund in medio. It will be convenient, and conduce to clearness, to consider the legal questions raised in the competition with reference to this as the fund in medio now com-

---

[1] Campbell v. Edderline, 1801, M. App., Adjudication, No. 13; Lord President in Stuart v. Jackson, Nov. 15, 1889, 17 R. p. 97.
[2] May 3, 1865, 34 L. J. Ch. 344.
[3] 7 R. 1176.
[4] Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, June 29, 1877, 4 R. 962.
[5] Gilmour v. Gilmours, July 3, 1873, 11 Macph. 853, 45 Scot. Jur. 521.

No. 194.

June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

peted for. It has since grown a little, and may continue to grow for a while, although the growth may stop at any moment.

Reading the trust-deed without regard, in the first instance, to any operation or effect upon it of the Thellusson Act, the trustees are directed to "retain and accumulate" the rents that may arise during the period between the death of the truster's widow and the death of the longest liver of his nephews and nieces, being sons and daughters of his two brothers Charles and Napier, and with the accumulated fund to purchase lands to be entailed along with the lands which he had himself conveyed to them—that is, to increase the landed property to be entailed as directed in the deed. This is the only direction to accumulate with which we are now concerned, and it is annulled by the Thellusson Act. There is no dubiety about the direction, or about the absolute nullity of it by the Act. The statute enacts that the rents, the accumulation of which it prohibits, shall go to and be received by such person (or persons) as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed. If such person can be ascertained from the provisions of the will, legitimately construed with reference to the event,—that the provision directing accumulation has become inoperative,—the will must of course have effect, and if not, recourse must be had to the law of intestacy.

Accordingly the question which I propose first to consider is, whether or not the trust-deed expresses the testator's will with reference to the event which has happened, viz., that the provision thereof which directs accumulation has become incapable of execution. The truster did not contemplate this event and so made no express provision for it. But a will may satisfactorily disclose and manifest the testator's intention in an event which he did not contemplate. The cases illustrative of this are numerous and various. The question here therefore is, not whether the will before us contains an express declaration of the testator's intention in the event which has occurred, contrary to his expectation,—which it certainly does not,—but whether it enables us, not to conjecture, but to collect the testator's intention in that event with such reasonable judicial certainty as the Court may, and does familiarly, act upon in directing the execution of wills.

It is urged, on the one hand, that the direction to entail must be obeyed according to the very words of the trust-deed, and that the entail is therefore to be executed "after the decease of the longest liver" of the children of the testator's brothers Charles and Napier, and in no event before; and that the trustees must till then retain possession of the lands and draw the rents, but without any direction, express or implied, as to the disposal of them. If this be so, it follows that the institute of entail by the will cannot be known till the death of the longest liver of the children of these two brothers—that till then there can be no entail, and that the rents meanwhile must go according to the law of intestacy.

On the other hand, it is maintained that the direction to defer the execution of the entail till the death of the longest liver of the children of Charles and Napier was given with reference, and manifestly only with reference, to the direction to accumulate the rents, which is annulled by the statute; and that the testator's only reason and motive for ordering the execution of the entail to be deferred being inapplicable in the event which has occurred, his intention will not be frustrated but fulfilled by its immediate execution.

In deciding between these conflicting contentions the first point to be considered is, whether there is any reasonably conceivable reason or motive for the order to defer the execution of the entail till the death of all the children of Charles and Napier besides the accumulation of the rents with a view to increase the lands to be entailed. That alone is certainly an intelligible, obvious, and sufficient reason, and I can imagine no other. The lifetime of any of the children of two brothers (none of whom were or could be benefited by the will) was a whimsical enough mode of limiting a period of accumulation—just as the lifetime of the Pope or of the Sovereign of this or any other country, or of any other mortal, would have been. But the accumulation itself, however uncertain the period of it, was quite intelligible. I cannot predicate the rationality or even intelligibility of the suggestion that there is thus manifested a preference to one rather than another heir of his own body, or to one rather than another heir of the body of Leveson Granville Alexander Campbell, or of George Gunning John Campbell, or of the heirs specified in his (the truster's) father's settlement—these being the heirs last called.

I must therefore conclude that the only purpose of deferring the execution of the entail after the widow's death was the accumulation which the statute annuls. But if so, the case seems, prima facie at least, to come within the rule applicable where the enjoyment of an estate given by will is deferred for a purpose, and only for a purpose, which has failed because it is illegal or otherwise. That rule is that the enjoyment shall have immediate effect. The most obvious and familiar illustration of the rule is when the gift and enjoyment of a fee given through the medium of trustees or executors is deferred till the death of a person to whom the income is directed to be paid during his or her life, and such person renounces and discharges the liferent provision. In such a case the only questions are (1st) whether the liferent provision was the only purpose of deferring the gift and enjoyment of the fee; and (2d) whether the renunciation is attributable to any indirect or oblique motive. Should the first question be answered in the affirmative and the second in the negative, it is, I think, not doubtful that the renunciation will operate immediately in favour of the donee of the fee ascertained as at the date of it. I venture to think the case even stronger for giving immediate enjoyment when the purpose for which alone it was deferred has failed, not by the voluntary act of a third party, such as a liferenter's renunciation, but by its inherent illegality. Such is the case under the will we are considering, as I regard it, and I am therefore of opinion that the time has arrived for giving the enjoyment of the testator's lands to the heirs specified by him by executing an entail in their favour as directed. And this is in harmony with the Thellusson Act. For the true view, in my opinion, is that the postponement of the enjoyment of these heirs by deferring the execution of the entail till the termination of the lives which the testator, however whimsically, selected as the measure of the accumulation which he desired, in order to augment the estate to be entailed, is merely incidental to the direction to accumulate, and so is annulled along with the direction of which it is an incident. The enjoyment of the income will thus go exactly as it would have done had the accumulation annulled by the Act not been directed. If the only obstruction to the immediate execution of an entail in the very terms and on the very heirs directed is that the period of accumulation has not expired, then that obstruction is removed by the annulling of the direction to accumulate.

But another obstacle is urged, and I proceed to consider it. The testator having left no heirs of his body, the first heirs directed to be called by the entail are the heirs-male of the body of Leveson Campbell, who being alive,

No. 194.

June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

although he has living sons, has no heir-male of his body, for nemo est hæres viventis. Now, I have to point out that this difficulty, whatever its value, concerns only the eldest son, and also, it may be, the male descendants generally of Leveson Campbell. For if on the more general aspect of the case which I have hitherto dealt with the opinion which I have expressed shall be rejected, the necessary result is that the execution of the entail must be deferred and beneficial enjoyment under the will postponed till all the children of the truster's brother Charles (of whom Leveson is one) are dead, and in this view of the larger and more general question the difficulty now suggested is manifestly immaterial, and indeed cannot arise. I propose therefore to consider it upon its own merits, and with reference to the only view of the case in which it can present itself as of any practical significance. For clearness and succinctness I put it thus,—the truster has directed his trustees to hold the land and accumulate the rental during the lifetime of Leveson Campbell, and on his death to entail on the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, on the heirs-male of George Campbell's body, and with other "whom failings" as in the deed. The statute annuls the direction to accumulate, and declares that the rights under the deed shall be taken to be as "if such accumulation had not been directed." My opinion is that the time for executing the entail has come. But then it is pointed out, and truly, that Leveson Campbell is alive, and urged as the necessary consequence that, although he has living sons, there are no heirs-male of his body. George Campbell is dead, but there is a host of other heirs called on the failure of Leveson's heirs. Are we to direct the trustees to act on the footing that the heirs of Leveson have failed? I could not assent to this as the result of any reasonable application of the maxim nemo est hæres viventis. We are dealing not with a deed of conveyance but with a will, and the duty of trustees to carry it out by executing a conveyance which will fulfil the testator's intentions. Now, in collecting the intentions of a testator to be fulfilled by his trustees in executing his instructions, we are not hampered by such technical considerations as may occur in the construction of a deed of conveyance. I have no difficulty in holding that the testator here preferred the sons and male descendants of Leveson to those of George, notwithstanding the use of the term "heirs," and that we should not follow but violate his intention by ordering his trustees to prefer the heirs of George to those of Leveson, because Leveson being alive the term "heirs" did not technically fit them. I should indeed be prepared, if necessary, to go further, and hold that under the destination of the most formal conveyance to the heirs-male of the body of A B (A B himself being clearly excluded) his sons would take although A B should himself happen to be in life when the succession opened and that his survivance would not be either a hindrance to its opening or favourable in any way to heirs subsequently called.

Put the case that the truster here had directed his trustees on the death of the survivor of himself and his wife to divest themselves by a conveyance to the heir-male of the body of Leveson Campbell (Leveson himself being distinctly excluded). Would the divestiture and conveyance in favour of the eldest living son of Leveson have been hindered or delayed by the circumstance of Leveson's own survivance whereby the term heir did not technically fit his son, or on the consideration that it was proper, in deference to the truster's intention, to wait till Leveson's death in order to see the state of his family then, and that the rental meanwhile ought to be regarded as intestate succession?

No. 194.
June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

The opinion which I have formed implies the possibility of ascertaining the institute or heir of entail "pointed out" by the will, as at or with reference to any time subsequent to the commencement of the trust, however long prior to the period appointed by the testator for its termination and the divestiture of the trustees; while the contrary opinion adopted by the Lord Ordinary (following Lord Curriehill) assumes, as distinctly, the impossibility of doing so. Now, it is instructive to observe that the testator himself assumed this very possibility which my opinion implies and the adverse view negatives, for his will contains this declaration,—"that the institute or heir of entail herein pointed out for the time being, who but for the continued existence of the trust hereby created would be in possession of the said lands and estate of Fairfield and others particularly herein described and hereby disponed, shall be entitled to provide and secure his wife and younger children who shall not succeed to the said lands and estate of Fairfield and others last above mentioned in provisions of the like amount as if such institute or heir were actually in possession of my said lands and estate of Fairfield and others last above mentioned, in virtue of the said deed of entail directed to be executed thereof."

If you apply to this declaration the reasoning of Lord Curriehill, which the Lord Ordinary adopts and on which he rests his judgment, you make it inoperative and indeed unmeaning: for according to that reasoning "the institute or heir of entail herein pointed out" cannot possibly be discovered, as Lord Curriehill expresses it, "until after the death of the longest liver of the truster's widow, nephews, and nieces," which is plainly not "the time being" referred to by the testator in the declaration which I have just cited. It is, I think, manifest that the testator himself intended that his will should, and believed that it did, "point out" the institute or heir of entail "for the time being," meaning any time whatever during the subsistence of the trust and prior to the time appointed by him for its termination, viz., the death of the longest liver of certain persons; and that on a reasonable construction of his will such institute or heir could be ascertained.

Suppose it to be clear and matter of judgment that the trust in the event that happened terminated at the widow's death, and that it only remained to close it by a divestiture of the trustees, the question would remain in whose favour the divestiture was to be made. Now, on this question is it reasonably conceivable that it ought to be made in favour of the truster's heir ab intestato, inasmuch as the trust-deed did not "point out," that is to say, enable the Court to ascertain, the institute or heir of entail "for the time being," viz., the death of the widow? But if not, then you must of necessity determine who is the institute or heir "pointed out" by the will, and I have stated my opinion and the reasons of it that the institute so pointed out is the eldest son of Leveson Campbell, notwithstanding that by reason of his father's survivance the term "heir" of his father is not for the moment technically applicable to him or any other. The only alternative is to defer the divestiture of the trustees till the father's death, or for a longer period, viz., the death of all Charles and Napier's children, and decree intestacy with respect to the rental meanwhile, for if the heirs "pointed out" by the will are in succession to have the rental till the execution of the entail, no good or even rational purpose will be served by deferring the execution and maintaining the trust.

The declaration which I have cited supports, I think, very strikingly the proposition on which my opinion is based, viz., that the continuance of the trust

No. 194.

June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

during the survivance of the widow was directed solely for her benefit, and after her death solely for the accumulation of the rental in order to enlarge the property. The language of it is indeed inconsistent with the notion that the truster intended that this desired continuance should, in the event that these the manifest purposes of it failed, be taken as affording a rule or criterion for determining who was "the institute or heir of entail herein pointed out for the time being." He contemplated no doubt that such institute or heir for the time being should go without the rents, first, while the widow enjoyed them, and, second, while they were being accumulated to buy more land. But at the same time he says in words that he is "pointed out," and that he shall have certain not unimportant rights as if he were "actually in possession" as such institute or heir. To ignore this, and on a subtle and, I think, captious argument to hold that the heir for the time is not pointed out and cannot be ascertained is, in my opinion, unwarrantable. With such a will as we are dealing with intestacy is, if reasonably possible, to be avoided.

In the view, contrary to my opinion, that the trust is to be prolonged till the death of all the children of Charles and Napier, and that the law of intestacy applies to the beneficial right to the rental meanwhile accruing, I concur with the Lord Ordinary. I think, in this view, that the beneficial interest in the rental is heritable estate, or, in other words, that the law of primogeniture applies to it—that it goes to the hæres or person favoured by that law. There is no other distinction that I know of between heritable and moveable estate. To what kind of estate the law of primogeniture applies, and to what it does not, is necessarily positivi juris. And here the Thellusson Act is of no significance whatever, although the law of resulting trust is. The case in hand, in the view of it I am now assuming, is that the owner of land has conveyed it to trustees without any direction, express or implied, as to the use or application of the rental for a certain or uncertain, longer or shorter period. The trustees are not, of course, entitled themselves to appropriate such rental, and this is only avoided by the doctrine of resulting trust, the only possible question being to whom does the trust result. It would of course result to the truster himself if in life, and being dead it must result to his successor by the law of primogeniture, or otherwise according to the quality of the estate. By our positive law, as I understand it, the law of primogeniture applies to land as at the time of the ancestor's decease in so far, but only in so far, as not alienated by him. Now, here certain lands have been alienated to a certain extent, but not so far as regards the beneficial interest in the rental thereof, or return therefor during a limited period. That rental is to be drawn by trustees on a trust resulting to the truster, or (he being dead) his heir therein, viz., his heir determined by the law of primogeniture. This seems to me to be the simple case of an heir taking the beneficial interest in his ancestor's land in so far as such beneficial interest has not been alienated. Why the heir should not be ascertained as at the death of the ancestor, or why he should take subject to any restriction whatever, I fail to comprehend. The trust-settlement of the ancestor may of course exclude his heir with respect to all or any part of the estate, and if it does then there is no intestacy with respect to such estate. But in so far as he is not excluded —which is exactly in so far as the estate is not given to another—the administrative legal title in the trustees cannot affect the question who is the heir, or the character of his right to what he takes, i.e., to what has not been given to another. Here the (ex hypothesi) unalienated estate is the rent of land for an uncertain period, which may be long or short as it happens. It would have been exactly the same had it been for a certain term of say fifty years. The ancestor has not alienated his land with respect to the beneficial interest in the return therefrom for fifty years, although he has made provision for the administration and management of the land itself. This, as heritable estate unalienated by the deceased owner, goes to his heir-at-law to be ascertained by the rules of the common law, unaffected by the trust-deed or the Thellusson Act, and with his rights therein equally subject to the rules of the common law only.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I need not resume the facts of this case. They are very fully and accurately stated by the Lord Ordinary.

The first question is, whether the Thellusson Act applies so as to prevent accumulations after the death of the widow, or whether the accumulation may go on for twenty-one years after that event?

In my opinion the answer of the Lord Ordinary is right. We have no decisions in Scotland. But those of the English Courts are directly in point, and I think that we ought to follow them. I do not say that the question is free from difficulty, but in view of a series of judgments of the highest authority I cannot look upon it as being any longer open. It is true that these judgments are not formally binding on us, but I should be very slow to establish in Scotland a construction of an imperial statute different from that which is settled in England.

The next question relates to the disposal of the rents which have accrued since the death of the widow.

They are claimed by Mr Leveson Granville Campbell as institute of entail. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that his claim cannot be sustained.

It is to my mind a sufficient ground of judgment that Mr Campbell does not possess the character in which he makes his claim. Passing over those parts of the destination which have failed, I find that the truster directs that on the decease of the longest liver of his nephews and nieces, children of his late brothers Charles and Napier, the entail is to be made on the heirs-male of the body of his nephew, Leveson G. A. Campbell, the eldest son of Charles, and a series of other heirs. Mr Leveson G. Campbell is the eldest son of Mr Leveson G. A. Campbell, and there is no doubt that if he be alive at the time when the entail is directed to be made he will be the institute of entail.

But, although he is the eldest son of his father, Mr Leveson G. Campbell is not and may never be his heir. So long as his father lives it can never be known who shall be the heir of his body, and until his death the person in whose favour the entail is to be made cannot be ascertained. The claimant therefore is not, and may never be, the institute of entail, and I cannot see how we can sustain his claim when he does not possess the character in which it is made. We are not dealing with a case where by reason of the direction to accumulate the enjoyment of a gift is postponed. The right is in suspense.

It was maintained that in consequence of the failure of the direction to accumulate the time had arrived for the execution of the entail. The reason is that the truster had no purpose for postponing its execution other than to enable the accumulations to be made. I cannot so read the trust-deed or hold that the entail is to be executed at an earlier date than that which the truster prescribed. I do not think that the truster had in his view the possibility of the direction to accumulate ceasing to be effectual. It is certain that he has made no provision for the occurrence of that event. In my opinion I am not entitled to conjecture what his views would have been if he had been aware of the operation of the Thellusson Act. He has expressed none, and I think that the only legitimate inference which we can draw is that he formed none.

No. 194.

June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

I think that I am bound to give effect to the intentions of the truster according to the language in which they are expressed. The direction to accumulate was made because the truster had to dispose of the rents which accrued due before the entail could be executed. The failure was an event which did not enter into his mind, and cannot, I think, afford a warrant for altering the whole scheme of the trust-deed.

As matters now stand, there is the further difficulty to which I have already adverted, that no one can at present claim the character of institute of entail. This to my mind is sufficient to dispose of the point which I am now considering. But if by reason of the death of Mr L. G. A. Campbell the heir of his body were ascertained, I do not think that such heir would be institute of entail so long as any of the nephews or nieces of the truster are alive. The institute of entail must be looked for at the time when the entail is to be executed, and cannot be ascertained until that time arrives.

To whom, then, are the rents to be given? The Lord Ordinary has held that they belong to Mr L. G. A. Campbell, as the representative in heritage of George Gunning Campbell, who was the heir of the truster ab intestato. I agree with his Lordship in thinking that Mr Campbell is entitled to be preferred to the rents, but I do not agree with the reasoning which has led him to that result.

We must keep in view that we are dealing, not with capital but income. The fund in medio consists of rents only. None of the claimants pretend or can pretend to have any right to the estate which yields the rents. That estate is vested in the trustees, who hold it for the purpose of entailing it at a future date.

Again, the rents are not in themselves heritable estate, in respect that they consist of money. They are the produce of heritable estate becoming due after January 1889. The owner of the estate has not disposed of them. Since his death there has been no owner other than his trustees, and as a consequence there could be no alteration of the legal order of succession other than that effected by the trust-deed itself. The trustees have a good and indeed the only title to ingather the rents, but they have no directions with regard to their disposal.

As I have said, the Lord Ordinary sustains the claim of the representative in heritage of George Gunning Campbell, the heir-at-law of the truster, as at his death. But this assumes that the rents belonged to George Gunning Campbell. If they did not, they could not be taken up by his representative. He died in 1858. To my mind it is clear that rents which did not become due till 1889 could not belong to a person who died before that date. I should think it a self-evident proposition that the interest of money or the rent of lands cannot belong to one who dies before they accrue. If the truster had died intestate, and George Gunning Campbell had succeeded as his heir, the latter would have been entitled to the rents which accrued due up to his death, and to no more. It can make no difference that we are dealing with a case where the rents are set free by the operation of the Thellusson Act. That circumstance can never enlarge the rights or estate of the heir ab intestato. I am therefore of opinion that the rents cannot be claimed by anyone as the representative of George Gunning Campbell.

No. 194.

June 30, 1891.
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell.

For precisely similar reasons, I have no difficulty in repelling the claim of the next of kin of the truster as at the date of his death, or the representatives of such next of kin. The next of kin can have no claim except to the moveable estate of the truster, and the rents in question never formed a part of his moveable estate. It is impossible that they could, for the simple reason that they were not in existence at the time of his death.

As I read the record, no claim has been put forward on the part of the next of kin of the truster as at the date of the widow's death. If it had been made I should have repelled it. For the reasons already assigned, they cannot claim in a representative character, nor do I see any principle on which they could claim in their own right the produce of an estate when they can have no possible claim to or interest in the estate itself.

There remains the claim of the heir-at-law as at the time when the rents accrued, and in my opinion his claim ought to be sustained. It is perhaps not enough to say that it is the only other possible claim. But it seems to me well founded in principle. If the truster had died intestate, and the law of intestate succession had run its ordinary course, he would have been entitled to the estate itself and to the rents. The legal succession has been so far excluded by the fact that the estate has been conveyed to trustees in order that they may execute an entail at a future time, but to no further extent. It is a plain principle of law that the rights of the heir cannot be defeated except by a conveyance in favour of another, and whatever is not so conveyed remains with the heir. It follows, I think, that until the time arrives at which the trustees are directed to entail, they hold for the benefit of the successive heirs-at-law, who are therefore entitled to the rents as they become due. They will take them—not in a representative capacity—but in their own right.

LORD TRAYNER and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred with Lord Rutherfurd Clark.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th findings of the Lord Ordinary, and in lieu thereof find that the fund in medio belongs to the heir-at-law of the truster as at the date when the rents of which it is composed became due: Quoad ultra affirm the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary."

TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S.—BLAIR & FINLAY, W.S.—A. & A. CAMPBELL, W.S.—E. A. & F. HUNTER, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 195.

June 30, 1891.
Harris v. North British Railway Co.

JACOB HARRIS, Pursuer (Respondent).—Young—Craigie.
NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Asher—Cooper—Hunter.

Railway—Carriage of passengers—Expulsion of passenger.—The servant of a railway company who has, without taking any objection, accepted from one of the passengers in a railway carriage tickets as for all the occupants of that carriage, is not entitled, on discovering that one of these tickets is defective, to remove from the carriage the person from whom he had so accepted the tickets and treat him as if he had been the holder of the defective ticket.

Opinions that the person who so collects the tickets from his fellow-passengers and hands them to the official does not thereby incur responsibility of any kind.

No. 195.

June 30, 1891. Harris v. North British Railway Co.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

I.

ON 13th November 1890, Jacob Harris, a Polish Jew, was travelling with five other Jews, all of whom, like himself, spoke German, in a third class railway carriage, which had come from Fife, and stopped for collection of the passengers' tickets at the Haymarket Station, Edinburgh. Before the train had stopped Harris had collected the tickets of his fellow-travellers and handed the bundle of tickets to the collector who came for them. He took them from Harris, who was known to him and the other officials at the station, as a person who frequently travelled on the line, without making any objection, and left the carriage. He returned in two or three minutes, having discovered among the six tickets one from Leven to Kirkcaldy, and demanded payment from Harris, who refused to pay. Thereupon Harris was with some force taken out of the carriage, and taken along the platform to the ticket-collector's office, from which he was dismissed after giving his name and address.

Harris now raised an action of damages against the railway company for £50.

He pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having been illegally compelled to leave the defenders' train, and subjected to unwarrantable abuse and defamation, is entitled to reparation. (2) The defenders are answerable for the unfounded charge which they persist in making against the pursuer, and ought, in respect thereof, to be found liable in damages.

The railway company defended. They denied on record a statement made by the pursuer that he was travelling on the day in question with a return ticket from Kirkcaldy to the Waverley Station.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuer having tendered to the defenders' collector at Edinburgh a ticket not available for the journey he was then making, and having refused to pay the fare for the said journey, the defenders' collector was entitled to expel the pursuer from the said carriage. (3) The defenders' servants not having acted illegally in the premises, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced. (4) The defenders' servants having properly exercised the powers conferred upon them by 96th, 97th, and 102d sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the defenders should be assoilzied.*

On a proof it was established on the evidence of the company's own servants that the pursuer's statement as to his own ticket was true, and that he had been travelling on the day in question with a valid ticket which was the only return-ticket of the six. The defective ticket belonged to one Levi, who had been travelling in the same compartment. He did not speak English, and in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary might have been travelling innocently on the defective ticket.

---

* Sec. 96 provides,—"If any person travel or attempt to travel in any carriage of the company, or of any other company or party using the railway, without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or if any person, having paid his fare for a certain distance, knowingly and wilfully proceed in any such carriage beyond such distance without previously paying the additional fare for the additional distance, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or if any person knowingly and wilfully refuse or neglect, on arriving at the point to which he has paid his fare, to quit such carriage, every such person shall for every such offence forfeit to the company a sum not exceeding forty shillings."

Sec. 97 provides,—"If any person be discovered either in or after committing or attempting to commit any such offence, all officers and servants and other persons on behalf of the company . . . may lawfully apprehend and detain such person until he can conveniently be taken before some Justice, or until he be otherwise discharged by due course of law."

Sec. 102 provides for making bye-laws.

Lord Kincairney (Ordinary) found "that on the date libelled the pursuer was illegally and wrongfully and forcibly removed by the defenders from the railway carriage in which he was seated, and was prevented from completing the journey for which he had purchased a railway ticket from the defenders, and that the defenders are liable in damages therefor," and assessed the damages at £25."*

No. 195.

June 30, 1891.

Harris v. North British Railway Co.

* "OPINION.— . . . Now the pursuer was certainly in the position of a passenger with a proper ticket. He had prima facie right under his contract with the defenders to be in their carriage, and to be conveyed by it to the Waverley Station, and that being so, it lies on the defenders to establish their right, either at common law or under statute, to remove him from their train before the end of his journey. The only statutory powers which were referred to are contained in the 96th and 97th sections of the Railways Clauses Act; but these do not directly apply, because they, in their terms, apply only to the case of passengers who attempt to travel without payment of their fare, which the pursuer was not doing.

"It was argued for the defenders that the pursuer, by collecting the other tickets, became the agent of the other passengers for the purpose of delivering their tickets, and of so fulfilling their obligations to the railway company. Assuming that it was part of their contract to deliver their tickets, and that he thereby became liable to fulfil all the obligations of the other passengers, it was said that he entered into a new contract with the railway company to that effect. I do not see how such a contract could be inferred, because it does not appear to me that the ticket-collector was capable of representing the railway company in any such contract. But, however that may be, the utmost that the defenders can make out of that argument seems to be that the pursuer might be liable for all the obligations of the other passengers, and so might be liable to pay the unpaid fare between Kirkcaldy and Edinburgh. But, assuming that to be so, it could only entitle the defenders to enforce that obligation by the ordinary legal methods. That could not, so far as I see, entitle them to remove the pursuer from the carriage, or to prevent the completion of his journey. They remained liable, whatever his obligation might be, to fulfil their contract with him, and to convey him in safety to the Waverley Station.

"But it was maintained, as I understood the argument, that the collector was entitled to attribute all the unexceptionable tickets to the other passengers and to treat the pursuer, contrary to the actual fact, as the holder of the wrong ticket. I do not say that there might not be cases where a right of that kind might arise to a railway company; for example, if one passenger should hand five tickets to the collector when there were six passengers in the compartment there might be circumstances in which the company might be entitled to deal with him as being himself without a ticket. But in this case the means were at hand for identifying the pursuer's ticket. It was the only return-ticket, and, so far as I can see, it was certain and undisputed that that ticket was his. I do not see that in these circumstances the defenders could disregard that fact.

"The proceedings of the defenders, or those who acted for them, and whose actings they adopt, could only, so far as I see, be justified on the view that they were entitled to regard the pursuer as being without a ticket, and as endeavouring to travel without payment of his fare. But they could not, I hold, regard him in either light, because he had a ticket, and they knew or had the means of knowing that he had. No regulation was pointed out by which it was made the duty of the ticket-collector or of the stationmaster to remove a passenger in such circumstances. Both collector and stationmaster seem to have reached the conclusion that there was a conspiracy to defraud them, or that the pursuer was trying to defraud them, with a rapidity which amounts to rashness; and I hold that in acting on their suspicion, without clear legal warrant, they took the risk of finding themselves in the wrong. Even if it were true that the pursuer had been engaged in a felonious conspiracy for the purpose of palming off on the company the false ticket of another passenger, I cannot find any warrant in the Railway Act for holding that the stationmaster and collector were entitled

No. 195.

June 30, 1891. Harris v. North British Railway Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and repeated the arguments dealt with by the Lord Ordinary; they excused their servants in the first place by pointing out how easy it was for these foreigners, who all understood each other, to concoct the plot to be carried out by the collection of the tickets by one of their number, and they urged that the pursuer by his conduct had barred himself from founding on the fact, which they now admitted, that he himself had a good ticket. They were entitled to remove one of the six men; which of the six the collector could not say, because the pursuer by his act had destroyed all means of knowledge. Having so destroyed the means of knowledge, and therewith his own defence, he must suffer. The authority of Butler's case,[1] cited on the other side, could not prevail against that of Apthorpe,[2] a case decided in this Court.

The pursuer argued;—His own right to be in the carriage was now admitted. Even if he had constituted himself an agent, that did not involve the criminal consequences of ignominious extrusion and the rogue's march along the platform. The responsibilities of an agent were civil responsibilities. But it was an absurdity to speak of the doctrine of agency. If the collector had asked the pursuer to re-assign the tickets to the individual passengers, and he had refused or failed in doing so, the plea of bar might have arisen against him. But no such request was made, and hence it was the collector who, by his homologation of the pursuer's conduct as amateur collector, was barred. In any event the remedy was only that which had been decided to be the remedy where a man had lost his ticket,[1] viz., to take his name and sue him for the price.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer was a traveller in a train from Fife to Edinburgh, and was in possession of a ticket entitling him to continue his journey to Waverley Station. On arriving at Haymarket—the station for collecting tickets—his fellow-travellers in the compartment handed their tickets to him, he being next the platform. On the ticket-collector coming to the compartment the pursuer handed him the tickets of the other passengers along with his own, and the ticket-collector left the compartment. He returned after a short interval. How long it was is not clear from the evidence, but I shall take it that his return was almost immediate. He demanded payment of 1s. from the pursuer on the ground that one of the tickets delivered up by the pursuer was a ticket from to take the law in their own hands, and to punish the pursuer by removing him from the carriage.

---

"Lastly, it was said that in any case the pursuer had brought all that had happened to him upon himself, and could not complain if the railway company had acted on the suspicions which his conduct had excited.

"But I am not of opinion that the conduct of the pursuer warranted the defenders in acting on their suspicions in the way they did.

"No doubt it is true that railway companies may be liable to be defrauded in this way, when passengers choose to collect their tickets and deliver them at once. But I think there is no great danger if the collector takes care to examine the tickets immediately and before leaving the carriage, and there may be courses open to them, in such circumstances, by which they may protect themselves. At all events the railway companies have no security except what the Railway Act and their bye-laws afford, and if these do not cover the case, they must be content with the rights and remedies of ordinary creditors. . . ."

[1] Butler v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 1886, L. R. 21 Q. B. D. 207.

[2] Apthorpe v. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co., Dec. 13, 1882, 10 R. 344.

No. 195.

June 30, 1891.
Harris v. North British Railway Co.

Leven to Kirkcaldy, and that therefore the fare of 1s. from Kirkcaldy to Edinburgh must be paid by him. The pursuer declined to pay and was compelled to leave the train. Whether force was used or not is disputed, but the Lord Ordinary has found that he was forcibly removed, and upon the evidence I concur with the finding, specially looking to the fact that the defenders' own case upon record is that no unnecessary force was used. It is clear upon the evidence that the pursuer was made to understand that he would not be allowed to proceed by the train, and left it on compulsion, justly feeling that he could not resist the officials who ordered him to come out. He was taken along the platform to the stationmaster's office, and was there for the first time asked to give his name and address. The train in the meantime went on, and he was compelled to wait for a later train. For the indignity and detention to which he was subjected he has raised the present action against the railway company.

The defenders do not now—upon the facts ascertained by the proof—deny the pursuer's averments that he was a lawful passenger, and that they had contracted with him that he should be entitled to travel in their train to Waverley Station. But they justify their action upon a different ground, which is nowhere stated upon the record, viz., that the pursuer by taking the tickets of his fellow-travellers into his hands and handing them on to the ticket-collector made himself responsible for any defect that there might be in any of the other tickets, which might entitle the officials of the company to demand a money payment, on the ground that the ticket did not cover the whole of the journey. This is a somewhat startling proposition, and I confess it would have been more satisfactory to have seen it formulated in distinct terms in the record. The contention must either be that where a traveller passes on the ticket of another traveller to the company's collector and that ticket is unsatisfactory, the passenger who does this act of every day courtesy is in the legal position of being held to have delivered the unsatisfactory ticket as his own, whatever may be the actual fact, or that he has become an agent, and as such responsible for any defect in his fellow-passenger's ticket, and liable to lose the benefit of his own contract of carriage unless he at once makes the defect good, or that, although it be the undoubted fact that his own ticket is good, the fact that he has handed on a bad one for another ipso facto cancels his own contract of carriage with the railway company, and debars him from continuing his journey for which he has paid in full unless he will make a further payment of money for the privilege. This latter view may be expressed in other words—that he is barred by passing the bad ticket to the collector from maintaining his right under his own contract.

But, whatever be the mode in which the proposition may be formulated, I concur with the Lord Ordinary in the view that the defenders' contention is unsound in itself, and that even if it were sound, it would not justify their removing the pursuer from a train in which he had by contract a right to travel. If the handing of the tickets of others could be held to constitute any new relation between the pursuer and the company in regard to the contracts of others with the company, I am unable to see how it could affect his own, or how it could confer upon the company a right practically to take him into custody in the train without any warrant, and to remove him from it. The idea of there being some sort of agency established, whereby he became responsible as an agent to the company for any deficiency of payment by other passengers as indicated by their tickets, even if it were plausible, which I do not think it is, would be no justification for personal detention. No agent is liable to be taken by force out of train in order to make him fulfil his agency obligation. But I hold further that there is no ground for maintaining any such agency. The proposition that a passenger, by giving up the tickets handed to him by fellow-passengers, becomes an agent to the effect of his having to answer as an agent any demand made upon him for a payment of money by a ticket-collector, under penalty of the company being entitled to break a contract made with him previously, and to subject him to violence in order to effect the breach, seems to carry its own absurdity upon its face. The defenders found upon certain sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, but these clauses, instead of helping them in this case, are important against their contention. For they are the only clauses under which they are entitled brevi manu to remove a passenger from a train, and the pursuer does not fall under any of them, and if his case does not fall under any one of them, then whatever claim they may pretend to assert against the pursuer, they must make it good by ordinary process of law, and cannot use the compulsitor of expulsion from their train of a passenger lawfully travelling under an onerous contract.

No. 195. June 30, 1891. Harris v. North British Railway Co.

An attempt was made to maintain that if railway companies could not act as the defenders did in this case, they would be exposed to serious difficulties in the conduct of their business. Even if this were so, their remedy would not be in taking the law into their own hands, but in applying to Parliament for the aid which they might require. But I see no ground for thinking that there is any difficulty in their way, such as their counsel endeavoured to magnify in argument. There is no doubt that it has become a very common practice for passengers to hand on their tickets to a fellow-passenger, and for the collectors to receive them from one hand. The very fact that this known practice has grown and become a thing of every day occurrence is proof that it does not tend to create such difficulties as the defenders conjure up. But one thing is certain, that railway companies have the remedy in their own hands. They are quite entitled to insist on each passenger delivering up his own ticket if they please, and to decline to accept them in bulk from one passenger. But their present practice being to accept tickets handed up in this manner, I cannot hold that they are entitled to turn round upon that passenger and without any inquiry, and at their own hand, to treat him as having forfeited his right to travel with a ticket for which he has paid.

There is a specialty in this case, apart from the general question, which it may be advisable to notice here, although in the view I take of the matter, and which I have already expressed, it is a specialty which need only be noticed. The ticket-collector, after receiving from the pursuer the tickets of the whole passengers, left the carriage without taking any exception to any of the tickets. It is admitted that it was his duty to examine the tickets in the compartment at the time of collection. According to his own evidence that is what he is "expected and directed to do." The importance of such a rule is obvious. It is analogous to the converse rule that at the issue of tickets passengers must check their change before leaving the ticket-window, otherwise mistakes cannot be corrected afterwards. The proposition of the defenders, startling as it is in itself, becomes still more startling when there is added to it the further proposition which is made essential by the facts of this case, that a ticket-collector who has left the compartment is entitled to come back, and to proceed to force a passenger out of the train, unless he will hand over at once a sum of money, upon the bare assertion that after leaving the carriage without challenging any passenger with regard to his ticket, and outwith the presence of the passengers, he had found that someone must have handed up an invalid ticket. If the case depended upon the view to be taken of that proposition, I should be inclined to hold that whatever right of summary ejection the company might have, if it were discovered at the collection of the tickets in the compartment that a ticket was invalid, and the matter were then and there taken up and dealt with, no such right can exist where the officials leave the carriage without making any challenge, and only return after an interval, however short, and assert that on an examination of the tickets outwith the presence of the passengers something has been discovered to be wrong. They may have, and probably have, a remedy, if they can prove their case, but I should have great difficulty in holding that in such circumstances they could exercise their special statutory remedy of ejection. The ticket-collector, by leaving the compartment without examining the tickets, deprives the traveller of his only check on the ticket-collector's proceedings and thus puts the traveller absolutely in his power, if the company retain their right of ejection under their statutory bye-law. This would in my opinion, be unjust and oppressive. But as I said before it is not necessary to decide this point in the present case.

I have only to say in conclusion that I do not think the case of Apthorpe has any application to the question before us. There the pursuer was travelling practically without a ticket, for the ticket he possessed did not warrant him in being on the car on which he was until it was stamped at the Tramway Company's office. Until stamped it was not a ticket for that journey. When this was pointed out he insisted on continuing to travel, and refused to comply with the regulation. He therefore was personally and wilfully acting in defiance of competent regulations, and the company's officials had a duty to prevent his doing so. Here there is no such case. The defenders cannot dispute the contract, or the right of the pursuer under it. Their only case now is that certain circumstances occurring in reference to someone else's contract with the company, and with which the pursuer has got mixed up, entitle them notwithstanding his unexceptionable contract, to prevent by force his travelling under it.

I have on these grounds to move your Lordships to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that the expulsion of the pursuer from the railway carriage cannot be justified.

It might have been justified if it had been shewn that he was attempting to defraud the company, or if he had so conducted himself as to expose himself to just suspicion of having done so. Now, he is travelling with the proper ticket; there is no attempt to defraud; but it is said that by his conduct he exposed himself to just suspicion, although that turns out to be altogether groundless, because he handed the tickets of the other passengers with his own to the collector, and there is something defective in one of them. The importance which the railway company attach to this case is that it enables them to present for consideration the question whether a person is exposed to just suspicion by collecting and passing on the tickets of the other passengers, if there turns out to be anything wrong with any of them.

A subordinate view was argued to the Lord Ordinary, and to us, and I read

No. 195.
June 30, 1891.
Harris v. North British Railway Co.

his statement of the argument with wonder that anyone should have stated it. It was that by doing what he did the pursuer constituted himself the agent of the other passengers. I do not think it ever occurred to anyone before that one by passing on something quite honestly—it might be the bottles at a dinner table—raised the law of principal and agent, and made one's self an agent.

But as to the practice, which is referred to here as misconduct, it is so familiar that the Court may take judicial cognisance of it. It is as old as railway travelling, and takes place more often than not when you have several people in a carriage. To attribute misconduct to the person who collects the tickets in the way in which they were collected here, misconduct which shall give rise to civil consequences of any kind whatsoever, is an absurdity.

It is said that the practice may facilitate fraud, enabling a passenger to travel without a ticket and avoid detection. There is no reason to suppose that it does. I am led to the conclusion that it does not, for the practice is followed on all railways without let or hindrance. If the company have an objection to it they would require to give some notice of their objection to passengers. So long as it is pursued without a word of remonstrance from the company it is extravagant to say that it tends to fraud. I am confident that no company would venture to issue a general notice to prohibit the practice, and I am certain that any collector who insisted on walking up each carriage and collecting a ticket from each individual would find his conduct commented on in a way that would be very disagreeable to him.

I agree with your Lordship, my only doubt being whether the amount of damages is sufficient.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I agree in thinking that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

Lord Trayner.—It has been clearly ascertained, and is not now disputed, that when the pursuer was removed at Haymarket from the carriage in which he was travelling on the occasion in question, he was travelling in respect of a ticket which he had bought from the defenders, and which entitled him to travel to the Waverley Station. By the act of the defenders or their servants the pursuer was wrongfully prevented from completing his journey. The defenders therefore were guilty of a breach of contract. For this breach of contract, aggravated as I think it was by the circumstances under which it was committed, as well as by the fact that the pursuer was distinctly charged with an attempt to defraud the defenders (of which there is no proof), the Lord Ordinary has found the pursuer entitled to £25 in name of damages. I concur in this finding of the Lord Ordinary. The pursuer was in my opinion entitled to an award of damages against the defenders, and the amount which has been awarded is not excessive. I should have contented myself with simply stating my concurrence with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary had it not been for the argument offered by the defenders in defence of their servants' proceedings, which raises a question of some general interest. It is said that as the pursuer collected the tickets of his fellow-passengers, or received those tickets from his fellow-passengers before the defenders' ticket-collector reached the carriage, and handed them over, so to speak, in lump to the ticket-collector, he thereby constituted himself, in a question with the defenders, the agent of his fellow-passengers, and became liable to the defenders for any defect or deficiency in the tickets so received and delivered by him. Even assuming this to be so, I think the proceedings of the defenders' servants were unwarranted. Any responsibility which the pursuer incurred by acting as he did was at the most a civil—a pecuniary—responsibility to answer to the defenders for the amount of the fares which were due to the defenders for the journey performed in excess of that represented by the tickets delivered. There being no fraud on the part of the pursuer, it was an illogical and illegal view of his responsibility and of the defenders' rights to treat the pursuer as if he individually was travelling without a ticket, or a proper ticket, and in consequence to remove him from the carriage. But I demur entirely to the defenders' contention. It appears to me that if the defenders' ticket-collector accepted delivery of the tickets in lump from the pursuer he thereby homologated the pursuer's actings in collecting the tickets, and that the pursuer thereafter could not be held responsible for any defect or deficiency which a subsequent examination of the tickets disclosed. It was the ticket-collector's right to have a ticket from each passenger, but by taking the whole tickets together from one passenger he waived that right, and if loss arose from his doing so, he, or his employers, must bear it. He could have declined to receive from the pursuer more than his own ticket, allowing each passenger to recover his own, and deliver it himself. If any dispute arose among the passengers as to which ticket belonged to each respectively, the ticket-collector would not be interested therein, as each passenger is bound to deliver to him a ticket for the journey performed; the passenger, if any, who could not produce such a ticket would be the person responsible to the ticket-collector. But that one passenger to whom, for convenience, the other passengers have handed their tickets for delivery to the ticket-collector should thereby incur any responsibility whatever (except that of handing them over as he received them to the ticket-collector) is a view which is not only novel, but, to my mind, unsound. The ticket-collector may, in my view, act strictly according to his right, and exact delivery of a ticket from each passenger, but failing his doing so, any consequence resulting from such failure must be borne by himself and not by the passenger from whom he consented to receive the tickets of the whole passengers together.

No. 195.

June 30, 1891.
Harris v. North British Railway Co.

THE COURT adhered.

GEORGE JACK, S.S.C.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 196.

July 1, 1891.
Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co., Limited, v. Taylor.

THE PARTICK, HILLHEAD, AND MARYHILL GAS COMPANY, Limited, First Parties.—Lorimer—Younger.
ROBERT TAYLOR, Second Party.—C. J. Guthrie—M. J. Davidson.

Company—Reserve and depreciation fund—Distribution among shareholders on sale of undertaking.—The directors of a gas company, as authorised by the articles of association, from time to time carried parts of the company's profits to a reserve fund and a depreciation fund. The directors paid repairs of the works out of revenue, and applied the whole of the reserve and depreciation funds to the extension of works and other capital purposes of the company. The company's undertaking having been sold, a question arose between the preference shareholders, who had always received their full dividend, and the ordinary shareholders, as to the mode in which these funds should be dealt with.

Held that the ordinary shareholders were entitled to both funds, and that they fell to be deducted from the price of the works before a distribution among all the shareholders was made.

No. 196.

July 1, 1891.

Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co., Limited, v. Taylor.

2D DIVISION. C.

Company—Sale of undertaking—Parliamentary proceedings.—Held that the expenses incurred by a gas company in parliamentary proceedings, which resulted in an arrangement under which the company's undertaking was sold, should not be charged against the revenue of the year preceding the sale, but against the price obtained for the undertaking.

THE PARTICK, HILLHEAD, AND MARYHILL GAS COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, on the 2d of May 1871, with a capital of £50,000.

By article 6 of the company's articles of association power was given "to increase the capital of the company by the creation of new shares, whether ordinary or preferential or special, and on such terms and conditions as the meeting" of shareholders "determine."

By resolution passed on 29th October 1872 the ordinary share capital was increased to £100,000.

On 22d August 1873 the shareholders resolved to further increase the capital of the company "by the sum of £30,000, to be issued in 6000 preference shares of £5 each, these shares to be entitled to a preferential dividend of £5, 10s. per centum per annum." These preference shares were duly issued, and from the date of issue till 30th June 1890 the dividend of 5½ per cent was paid on the preference shares, and an average dividend of from 3½ to 4 per cent was paid on the ordinary shares during the same period.

Under the articles of association the directors were authorised to set aside a reserve fund and also a depreciation fund, the clauses authorising this being as follows:—"13. Any part of the profits of the company may, at the discretion of the directors, be set apart as a reserved fund to be applied at their discretion—(a) For paying off debts of the company. (b) For equalising dividends. (c) For meeting contingencies. (d) For any other purposes of the company. 14. The reserved fund shall not at any time exceed in the whole £10,000. 15. Any part of the profits of the company may, at the discretion of the directors, be set apart as a depreciation fund, to be at their discretion applied to the repair and renewal of buildings, erections, vessels, plant, works, and other property of the company. 16. The depreciation fund shall not at any one time exceed 25 per cent of the original cost to the company of the property, buildings, and machinery in respect of which that fund is formed. 17. The moneys carried to the reserved fund and the depreciation fund respectively shall be invested in the company's name on such securities as the directors think proper, and the income arising from each fund shall be added thereto until it reaches its limit, and shall thereafter be deemed earnings of the company."

Clause 18 dealt with the application of the earnings. "18. All the earnings of the company, including all their receipts properly carried to the account of revenue, shall every year be applied as follows—1st. In payment of all taxes, rates, and rents, and other preferable charges payable in respect of the company's landed property and works, and all arrears, if any, thereof. 2d. In payment of all management, working, and other current expenses of the company, and all arrears, if any, thereof. 3d. In payments to the reserved fund and the depreciation fund. 4th. In payment to the preferential shareholders, if any, of their dividends, according to their respective priority. 5th. In payment of a dividend on the ordinary shares."

In 1890 the corporation of Glasgow promoted a bill for the extension of their boundaries so as to include a considerable portion of the area supplied by the company. The directors of the company, thinking that the passing of the bill would have a fatal effect upon the prosperity of the company, with the approval of the shareholders, opposed the bill and also promoted a bill of their own. The preamble of both bills was found to be not proven, and both parties resumed the proceedings in the following year.

No. 196.

July 1, 1891. Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co., Limited, v. Taylor.

On 24th March 1891, in accordance with resolutions passed by the shareholders, an agreement was entered into between the company and the corporation for the sale to the latter of the company's undertaking at the price of £202,500, with entry at 1st July 1891.

Questions thereafter arose between the company and its preference shareholders as to the sums available for distribution when the sale of the company's undertaking should be completed.

A special case was accordingly presented to the Court by (1) the company, and (2) Robert Taylor, Partick, Glasgow, as representing the preference shareholders, to obtain the opinion of the Court upon, inter alia, the following questions:—"3. Are the ordinary shareholders entitled to the reserve and depreciation funds, and must these funds be taken out of the price of the works before a distribution is made, or do these funds, in whole or in part, fall to be included in the capital fund available for distribution among all the shareholders? 4. Should the parliamentary expenses referred to, so far as these have not been already charged to revenue, be charged in whole or in part against the revenue of the year 1890-91 before paying a dividend to the preference and ordinary shareholders, or should they be charged against the capital fund to be distributed among all the shareholders?"

It appeared from the statements in the case that at 30th June 1890 the amount of the reserve fund was £205, 15s. 9d., and of the depreciation fund £14,228, 9s. 5d.; that the whole of the latter sum would, had not the directors applied the same to form a depreciation fund, have been available for payment of increased dividends to the ordinary shareholders, and might have been so applied; that the depreciation fund was not invested separately, but was used for extension of works and other capital purposes of the company; that no part of it had been used for repairs or renewals, all such being charged to revenue account; and that the works were then in a good and effective condition.

It further appeared from the case that in the course of the parliamentary proceedings in 1890 and 1891 expenses to the amount of £5000 had been incurred by the company, of which £1000 had been charged against the revenue of 1890; that in addition to the capital raised by the issue of shares the company had raised money by the issue of debenture stock and terminable debentures, and were due to the holders thereof £80,000; the revenue of the year ending 30th June 1891, after meeting all charges for interest on debenture stock and borrowed money, would shew a considerable surplus; and that the price of £202,500 adjusted with the corporation would not be sufficient, after payment of the parliamentary expenses and of the company's other debts, to repay to the shareholders the whole par value of the share capital, it being anticipated that the deficiency, if spread rateably over the whole share capital, would amount to about ten per cent thereof.

The case contained no statement to the effect that the shareholders had authorised the application of the reserve and depreciation funds to capital purposes.

Argued for the first parties;—(1) The depreciation and reserve funds were funds which, had they not been applied to extension of works and other capital purposes of the company, would have been available for the payment of dividends to the ordinary shareholders. They were, in short,

No. 196.

July 1, 1891. Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co., Limited, v. Taylor.

funds lent by revenue to capital[1] (without authority given to the directors by the shareholders), and the ordinary shareholders were entitled to receive them back. (2) The parliamentary expenses were incurred in defence of the whole property of the company, and fell, therefore, to be charged against the capital of the company.

Argued for the second party;—(1) The depreciation fund was intended for the purpose of keeping up the capital value of the works, and had been spent upon capital purposes, and fell to be included in the capital fund available for distribution.[2] (2) The parliamentary expenses, so far as not charged, fell to be charged against the revenue of the year 1890-91. But for the sale to the corporation, these expenses must have been dealt with as current expenses. In the schedule to the Gas-Works Clauses Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. c. 41), such expenses were treated in the manner proposed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The third question is one of importance and requires careful attention.

It appears that the directors of this gas company took a course which is unusual and quite beyond their ordinary duties. They put aside money which they represented to the shareholders as forming a reserve and depreciation fund, and from time to time spent these funds upon the erection of new works. It was admitted by counsel, as I understood him, that they did this without consulting the shareholders. At all events, it is not stated in the case that they obtained any such consent when they appropriated these funds to the construction of new works. Mr Guthrie felt compelled to admit that that money could only be held to have been borrowed by them for that purpose, and that they would need to restore it. The question the ordinary shareholders ask is, whether they are entitled to the amount of these reserve and depreciation funds in so far as they existed in the accounts at the time when the company came to an end. I am of opinion that they are.

It is to be kept in view that, as regards the capital price of the works, it must be held to have been increased by the amount of the value of those new works upon which the reserve and depreciation funds were spent. There is therefore no loss to anybody else in taking the amount necessary to replace those funds and dividing it, as what it really was—profits put aside to meet contingencies which, in the circumstances which have occurred, viz., the expiry of the company on the 30th of June 1891, those funds cannot now be spent in meeting. Therefore I think that the first alternative of this question must be answered in the affirmative.

The next question is more difficult. It relates to a matter about which there is very little authority, and it is peculiar in this respect that it is entirely exceptional. It relates to the expenses of parliamentary proceedings.

Now, in so far as such expenses were charged to revenue in 1890 I understand that no question is raised. The question relates to a sum of about £4000 which was expended in connection with the proceedings both in 1890 and in 1891, and which proceedings have resulted in the arrangement by which this company is bought up and paid for by the Glasgow Corporation.

We have no question to consider as to whether the bargain had been a good

---

[1] Mill v. Northern Railway of Buenos Ayres Co., June 29, 1870, L. R., 5 Ch. App. 621; In re Bridgewater Navigation Co., March 9, 1891, L. R., 2 Ch. Div. 317.

[2] In re Bridgewater Navigation Co., 1891, L. R., 1 Ch. Div. 155.

No. 196.

July 1, 1891. Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co., Limited, v. Taylor.

one or a bad one. We have only to deal with the question whether the expenses of obtaining that arrangement are expenses properly chargeable against capital—whether they ought to be deducted from the amount obtained from the corporation for the works.

I think that they do form a charge against the amount obtained from the corporation, and that we must therefore answer the first part of this question in the negative.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT answered the first alternative of the third question in the affirmative, and the first alternative of the fourth question in the negative, and found and declared accordingly.

MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—BRUCE & KERR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 197.

July 1, 1891. North British Railway Co. v. Moore.

THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Petitioners (Appellants).—J. C. Thomson—Dickson.
SAMUEL JOHNSTON MOORE AND OTHERS, Objectors (Respondents).—Jameson—Aitken.

Superior and Vassal—Feu-contract—Building restrictions—Jus quæsitum—Rights of feuars inter se—Nuisance—Dean of Guild.—A piece of ground in a residential district in Glasgow was feued to different persons by feu-contracts which were practically identical in terms. The feuars were taken bound to erect houses, and were prohibited from carrying on certain enumerated kinds of business on the ground feued, "or to carry on any other business though not above enumerated which may be nauseous or hurtful to the neighbouring feuars . . . . . in whose favour it is hereby declared that this provision shall operate as a servitude upon the lands hereby feued." The contracts further contained stipulations limiting the height of buildings to be erected, and as to the making of sewers, and it was declared that these provisions should be inserted in all subsequent dispositions of the lands "until complete fulfilment thereof, otherwise the same shall be void and null."

The North British Railway Company, who had acquired one of the feus, applied to the Dean of Guild of Glasgow for authority to erect a shaft on their feu for the ventilation of a tunnel in an underground railway. The superior did not oppose, but objections were lodged by some of the co-feuars. The Dean refused the petition. On appeal the Court recalled his deliverance, holding (1) with regard to the prohibitions which were declared to be a servitude that there was no contravention unless the proposed erection could be regarded as the carrying on of a nauseous or hurtful business, and that it was premature to decide that the shaft would be nauseous or hurtful; and (2) with regard to the other prohibitions (following Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, 8 R., H. L. 95), that there was no such mutuality of rights and obligations between the feuars established either expressly or by implication as to give the objectors a jus quæsitum which would entitle them to enforce the building restrictions contained in the feu-contracts.

Opinion (per Lord Trayner) that it was beyond the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild to decide whether the proposed erection would be a nuisance.

2D DIVISION. Dean of Guild at Glasgow. M.

IN 1887 the Glasgow City and District Railway Company was amalgamated with the North British Railway Company.

By the Act of 1882 incorporating the former company (45 and 46 Vict. cap. ccxvi.), they were bound to make all necessary provision for ventilating the railway to the satisfaction of the Corporation of Glasgow.

The corporation having required the North British Railway Company

No. 197.

July 1, 1891.
North British Railway Co. v. Moore.

to provide ventilation for the tunnel under West Regent Street, the railway company proposed to erect a ventilating-shaft on a feu on Blythswood estate, which the Glasgow City and District Railway Company had acquired in 1884 by private bargain from the trustees of Free St David's Church at the back of the houses on the east side of Blythswood Square.

On 7th February 1891 the railway company presented a petition of lining in the Dean of Guild Court of Glasgow against John Whyte, Master of Works, for the public interest, for authority to construct the shaft. The Master of Works did not oppose the petition, but objections were lodged by Dr Samuel Johnston Moore and others, neighbouring feuars upon the Blythswood estate, whose feu-contracts were admitted to be in terms mutatis mutandis practically identical with that of the railway company. The superior made no opposition.

The objector, Dr Moore, averred;—(Stat. 11) "The erection and use of the said ventilating-shaft and the erection and use of the said steam-engine are in contravention of the conditions in the petitioners' titles." (Stat. 12) "The erection and use of said shaft will be extremely nauseous and hurtful, and will occasion disturbance to the respondents, who are neighbouring feuars and disponees on the estate of Blythswood to the petitioners." (Stat. 13) "The erection and use of the ventilating-shaft, as aforesaid, will be extremely hurtful to the respondents. The smoke, steam, and gas extracted from the said tunnel, and emitted close to the respondents' properties, will cause them serious damage, both as owners whose property will be depreciated in value thereby, and as occupiers whose occupancy of the houses in the square will thereby be rendered practically impossible."

Dr Moore pleaded;—(1) The proposed erections being unlawful, the petition should be refused, with expenses. (2) The proposed erections being a contravention of the conditions in the petitioners' titles, the petition should be refused, with expenses. (2A) The proposed erections and works not being authorised by Act of Parliament, special or general, and being in contravention of the conditions of the title of said subjects referred to in the petition, the petition should be refused. (3) The proposed erections being injurious to the respondents and the petitioners having no right to make the same, the petition should be refused.

The piece of ground in West Regent Street upon which the church stood originally formed part of the Blythswood estate, and was feued out by the parliamentary trustees on that estate in 1814. It was outside the limits of deviation marked upon the railway plans.

The feu-contract in favour of the original trustees of the church was executed by Miss Mary Campbell of Blythswood in 1846. It contained the following clauses:—"Declaring that the said second party and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged immediately, in so far as not already done, to erect and thereafter to uphold and maintain upon the area of ground above described houses or other buildings of stone and lime and covered with slates, yielding a yearly rent at least equal to double of the feu-duty hereinafter mentioned payable by them. As also declaring that the foresaid lands are disponed by the said first party to the second party and their foresaids allenarly, with and under, and without prejudice, in any manner of way, to the conditions, qualifications, and provisions following, videlicet, That the said second party and their foresaids shall make no use of the subjects above described except what is consistent with and agreeable to the system adopted by the said parliamentary trustees (on the estate of Blythswood) for the uses of the adjoining property so far as the same is rendered obligatory on the feuars thereof by

No. 197.
July 1, 1891.
North British Railway Co. v. Moore.

the terms of the titles granted to them, and in so far as the said parliamentary trustees or their successors in office or the heirs of entail of Blythswood may be answerable that nothing be authorised inconsistent with or derogatory from that system; and more particularly, but without prejudice to this general qualification of the grant, it is hereby expressly stipulated that the said second party and their foresaids shall make no alienations except either of lots to be held feu in similar terms to those which have been made by the said trustees or under the most explicit obligations to employ the subjects in that manner; and specially declaring that it shall not be in the power of the said second party or their foresaids to make use of any part of the said ground for depositing dung or rubbish except such as are produced within the lands above described, or carry on any business of brewing, distilling, tanning of leather, making of soap or candle, glue, cudbear, vitriol, or to erect glassworks, foundries of brass, iron, or other metals, and steam-engines, or to carry on any other business though not above enumerated which may be nauseous or hurtful, or occasion disturbance to the neighbouring feuars and disponees upon the estate of Blythswood, in whose favour it is hereby declared that this provision shall operate as a servitude upon the lands hereby feued: Declaring also that all sales, dispositions, or conveyances of the whole or parts or portions of the said lands upon terms in violation of or inconsistent with the above provisions shall be ipso facto void and null with all that had followed or may follow thereon to the disponees thereof, which conditions and provisions hereinbefore written are appointed to be engrossed in the infeftment to follow hereon, and in all the subsequent dispositions, charters, and infeftments of the whole or of parts of the said lands, otherwise the same shall be void and null."

The lands were further disponed under conditions (1) as to the observance of a scheme of laying out streets, (2) as to the upkeep of common sewers and a right to use them for the purposes of drainage, (3) as to keeping the pavement on a street to be built upon the lands feued in good repair in all time coming. "Quarto, Declaring that the houses or other buildings to be erected on the lands hereby feued shall not exceed three square storeys, either in front or behind, besides a sunk storey, and the walls thereof shall be no more than 52 feet high above the level of the street, and the front walls of the said buildings shall be built of smooth stone ashlar of a white pile, and the office houses (if any be) behind the same shall be built of stone, and shall not exceed 21 feet in height from the level of the ground to the ridge of the roof thereof; . . . and there shall be no vents or chimney heads in or on the roof of the said houses or buildings fronting Regent Street, but liberty is hereby given to carry up in the wall fronting said street pediment vents, or ornamented stalk vents, with pedestals, provided they are all of the said smooth stone ashlar, and there shall be no dormer windows, . . . which last-mentioned conditions and provisions are appointed to be engrossed in the infeftment to follow hereupon, and in all the subsequent dispositions, charters, and infeftments of the whole or part of the lands hereby feued ay and until complete fulfilment thereof, otherwise the same shall be void and null."

The objectors founded on these clauses.

On 30th April 1891, the Dean of Guild (Ure) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, under the Glasgow City and District Railway Act, 1882, now vested in the petitioners, under the North British Railway Act, 1887, the powers and provisions therein as to the erection of ventilating-shafts are confined to lands or property required for the purposes and

No. 197.

July 1, 1891.
North British Railway Co. v. Moore.

under the powers of the said Act, and do not extend to lands and subjects otherwise acquired, and situated beyond the lines and limits of deviation of the said railway: Finds that the subjects referred to in the petition, and upon which it is proposed to erect the ventilating-shaft in question, are situated beyond and outside the limits of deviation of the said Act, and were not acquired under the powers of said Act: Finds that, although it were held that the petitioners were proprietors of and duly vested in the subjects referred to in the petition (which is very doubtful), they nevertheless have no other or higher powers than those of any other proprietor, and are bound to conform to the conditions, restrictions, and obligations imposed in the original feu-contract of said subjects: Finds that the ventilating-shaft proposed to be erected by the petitioners is in contravention of the conditions imposed in said feu-contract, in respect (1) of being greatly in excess of the height of buildings allowed to be erected on the ground so feued, (2) as proposed to be built of brick instead of stone, and (3) for a purpose that cannot but be nauseous and hurtful to the neighbouring feuars in a district which is almost entirely residential: Therefore refuses the lining craved, and dismisses the petition."

The railway company appealed, and argued;—(1) They were proprietors by purchase of the ground whereon they proposed to erect the ventilating-shaft. They did not therefore require statutory authority to erect it, even although the ground was outside the limit of deviation of property which they were entitled under their Act compulsorily to take. (2) The restrictions in their feu-contract, which fell to be strictly construed,[1] were restrictions as to the height and the nature of houses and buildings and upkeep of sewers; and in the list of businesses "which may be nauseous or hurtful," there was no word of such a chimney as the railway company proposed to erect. (3) It was quite settled[2] that the fact of the same conditions appearing in feu-charters derived from a common superior, coupled with a substantial interest in their observance, was not sufficient to give each feuar a jus quæsitum, and to entitle him to enforce them against any single feuar. There must be mutuality and community of rights and obligations otherwise established between them, either (a) expressed in the feu-contract, or (b) to be reasonably implied from a reference in all the feu-contracts to a common plan or scheme of building adopted by the superior, or (c) by mutual agreement among the feuars themselves. In the present case there might be identity of conditions, but there was nothing more, and further, the superior was not an objecting party. The reference in the feu-charters to the system of the parliamentary trustees could not avail the respondents, because it was admitted that that had been in many cases departed from. In M'Gibbon v. Rankin,[3] where an implied right to enforce a common condition was held to exist in each member of a class of feuars, the superior had feued out his land in separate lots for the erection of houses in streets or squares upon a uniform plan. In Robertson v. North British Railway Co.,[4] again, the superior had feued out a large area without any plan, but imposing certain general restrictions which the feuar was taken bound to insert in all

[1] Banks & Co. v. Walker, June 5, 1874, 1 R. 981; Rankine on Landownership, p. 398; Naismith v. Cairnduff, June 21, 1876, 3 R. 863; Buchanan, &c. v. Marr, June 7, 1883, 10 R. 936; Moir's Trustees v. M'Ewan, July 15, 1880, 7 R. 1141.

[2] Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1879, 7 R. 384, revd. June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95.

[3] M'Gibbon v. Rankin, Jan. 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 423, 43 Scot. Jur. 205.

[4] Robertson v. North British Railway Co., July 18, 1874, 1 R. 1218.

No. 197.
July 1, 1891.
North British Railway Co. v. Moore.

dispositions granted by him. The clause prohibiting the feuars from carrying on any business of a nauseous nature was made a servitude upon the lands conveyed, whereas the other restrictions were not. It was a fair inference that the right of one feuar to object to the operations of another was confined solely to the operations prohibited by that clause. (4) It was premature to consider whether the shaft would form a nuisance, and in any view, that was not a question for the Dean of Guild to decide.

Argued for the respondents;—The power given to the petitioners to erect ventilating shafts was given to them by the City and District Railway Act, 1882, and was necessarily confined to a power to erect them upon lands compulsorily acquired under the Act, and within the limits of deviation. But (2) assuming that in respect of their purchase of the church they were outside the statute altogether, they were not entitled to violate the conditions in their feu-contract. Where a proprietor had feued out a piece of ground in lots for building on a plan prescribed, it was reasonable to imply that each feuar contracted with reference to and in reliance on the conditions imposed on the others to observe the plan. Mutual servitudes enforceable inter se among the feuars were thereby constituted.[1] It was obvious from an examination of the charters, whose conditions and restrictions were practically identical, that the Blythswood estate was feued out as a unum quid upon a common plan. The objectors had a good title then to prevent the proposed erection. (3) It was so obvious that the chimney would form a nuisance that the Court were entitled to say at once that it was a contravention of the feu-contract. Banks'[2] case was very special, and had no bearing upon the present question.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The North British Railway, who have a line which runs below a considerable part of the city of Glasgow, are under an obligation, enforceable by the Town-Council of Glasgow, to have the underground part ventilated, and in their endeavours to carry out that obligation they have purchased property not very far from Blythswood Square in Glasgow, and they propose to make a ventilating-shaft from the top of their tunnel running at right angles to the street, but some distance off the street, and then to erect a brick shaft for the purpose of carrying off the foul vapours from the inside of the tunnel. They are doing this by a separate purchase. There is no question whatever of the railway company's right in the matter; it is not disputed that they have a right to acquire this ground, and the right to use it except in so far as they may be restricted by contract—they coming into the position of the original feuar.

All question between the superior and the feuar is out of the case, because the superior does not object to what the railway company propose to do, and the sole question which is before us is whether neighbouring feuars have the right to prevent the railway company's action. Now, their right to interfere with one of the Blythswood feuars in doing what he thinks proper to do upon his own ground in the matter of building, must be something of the nature of a servitude of a dominant over a servient tenement. There is no contract whatever between the feuars who are objecting to this being done and the railway company, and therefore a servitude must be found, if it exists, to be imposed on the railway company by the conditions of the feu-contract, to which they have got a right by purchasing the property from the previous proprietor.

[1] Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, vide supra, p. 1024, note 2, per Lord Young at 7 R. 393, Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson, at pp. 99 and 103 of 8 R.

[2] Banks & Co. v. Walker, vide supra, p. 1024, note 1.

No. 197. July 1, 1891. North British Railway Co. v. Moore.

Now, it has been, I think, very clearly and distinctly decided by the House of Lords in the case of Hislop that where a feu-charter from a common superior contains the same conditions as regards the different feuars in a particular street say, or district, and where all the feuars have an interest in the observance of the conditions which are set forth in these corresponding contracts, notwithstanding that, a feuar may have no right whatever to enforce the conditions against the other feuars, unless he has by direct stipulation in the titles or by implication a right to do so. The case of Hislop was certainly one of the strongest cases that could be conceived in favour of the feuar if he had any right in law at all. It was a case in Gayfield Square here, where the feuars were taken bound by the superior to build houses of a particular style, of a particular height, and at a particular distance back from the street, and to maintain the ground in front of the houses free from buildings, and to maintain a particular style of railing next the street. Now, Mr Hislop proceeded to build up the whole front garden up to the street, and in fact completely to change the whole aspect of the place, and necessarily to place a dead wall next the neighbouring feuar. If ever there was a case in which there might be said to be an implied right on the part of one feuar—in consequence of there being conditions imposed on all the feuars by the superior that they are to build in a particular way—to interfere with a neighbouring feuar, it would have been in that case; but it was held by the House of Lords, and it was the opinion of one of your Lordships in the case here in the Court of Session, that the feuar, apart from express stipulation of right by his title, had no such right.

Now, it really comes to a question here of what is the state of the titles of the feuars of this district, and whether they have by their titles any right as against neighbouring feuars to prevent them from doing such a piece of work as is proposed to be done by the North British Railway. Now, in the particular titles which are before us, it is remarkable that there are certain stipulations made by the superior to which he attaches absolutely the condition that there shall be a servitude in favour of other feuars, and these are with regard to certain businesses which are not to be carried on upon the feu. It is declared "that it shall not be in the power of the said second party or their foresaids to make use of any part of the said ground for depositing dung or rubbish, except such as are produced within the lands above described, or to carry on any business of brewing, distilling, tanning of leather, making of soap or candle, glue, cudbear, vitriol, or to erect glassworks, foundries of brass, iron, or other metals, and steam-engines, or to carry on any other business though not above enumerated which may be nauseous or hurtful, or occasion disturbance to the neighbouring feuars and disponees upon the estate of Blythswood, in whose favour it is hereby declared that this provision shall operate as a servitude upon the lands hereby feued." Therefore it is quite plain that careful consideration was given to those matters in the interest of the feuing of this part of Blythswood estate, and it was thought advisable to give each feuar a servitude right against the remaining feuars; but most certainly, beyond what is there specified, there is nothing at all touching the proposed erection by the North British Railway, unless it be suggested that it was the carrying on of a nauseous or hurtful business. The erection of a shaft to carry off vapours cannot in itself be so held.

No. 197.
July 1, 1891.
North British Railway Co. v. Moore.

It is of course a totally different question, and one independent altogether of the titles of these parties, whether if, after this erection is made, and it turns out a nauseous business, or hurtful to the neighbouring feuars, it cannot be put down as a nuisance; but I do not think that can possibly be decided except upon the facts as they arise. It would be anticipating what the railway company may do if they are allowed to put up this shaft, which they would do at their own risk.

Now, that stipulation being in the titles of the feuars of this district, I find that there are other stipulations made in reference to such matters as the height of houses, the making of sewers, and so on,—the usual clauses which are to be found in the titles relating to a residential neighbourhood; but these, I take it, must be held, under the case of Hislop, to be stipulations entirely as between the superior and the individual feuar, and that no tertius is to come in and attempt to enforce them. If the superior does not choose to enforce them, they cannot be enforced by anybody else. It is quite certain that in this particular district a very large number of these stipulations have been set aside in actual practice upon the estate, and the superior is not only not objecting, but is a consenting party to what is proposed to be done; and therefore I am compelled, following the case of Hislop, which I think went very far in this direction, to hold that the decision of the Dean of Guild here was a decision which he was not entitled to give, and that he was not entitled to refuse a lining to the railway company, who propose to erect this shaft upon back ground of their own property, and we must recall his judgment and remit back to him to grant the lining craved.

I would only like to say that, while not a matter of legal stipulation at all, it was publicly stated to us—and it was just what one would expect from a great company like the North British Railway—that, while they are proposing to erect the ventilating-shaft of brick, they do not intend in the event of its proving satisfactory, to keep it in a hideous and unsightly condition at that place. I am quite sure that they will face it up properly so as to make it as little as possible an eyesore to the neighbourhood; but we have only to settle the question of what is their legal right, and I am of opinion that their legal right is to have the authority to erect the ventilating-shaft which they ask.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. I think it is very important to keep in view that the railway company are not only entitled, but are bound to ventilate their underground railway to the satisfaction of the town-council; and the town-council thought that the most satisfactory, if not the only satisfactory, way of performing this statutory duty was that the railway company should acquire a piece of ground outwith the limits of deviation, and upon that put the necessary shaft in order to accomplish the ventilation which it was their duty to accomplish somehow or other. They did acquire this property, which was adjacent to their line, although beyond the limits of deviation. It is their property now, and I am of opinion that no objection can be stated on the part of the objectors to the right of the railway company to become the proprietors of that subject, which they are at this moment.

Another objection to what they propose to do with the approbation of the town-council in the discharge of their statutory duty is that they have no statutory authority to make any erection upon that ground. If they required statutory authority to do it that objection would be unanswerable, but I think it clear that they require none. They are, however, not entitled to do anything which any ordinary citizen of Glasgow acquiring this property would not be entitled to do. Now, an ordinary proprietor acquiring this property would be entitled, or he would not, to make this erection, according or not as it was a violation of the feu-contract upon which the ground was acquired, or an unlawful use of it in itself irrespective of that.

No. 197.

July 1, 1891.
North British Railway Co. v. Moore.

Now, to take the last first, I think it clear enough that no use unlawful in itself is proposed. The idea of a ventilating-shaft with a chimney being an unlawful erection in the city of Glasgow is a strange proposition, I must say.

Of course the question of nuisance remains. If the use leads to the production of a nuisance then it may be stopped, but I cannot adopt the view of the Dean of Guild, that it cannot be but nauseous and hurtful to the neighbourhood. That I suppose means—I do not think it is intelligible if it means anything else—that the discharge by the ventilating-chimney will be nauseous and a nuisance. Well, we are assured that it will not, but that if it is it will be stopped. If it turns out to be a nuisance it will be stopped by compulsion, if not stopped voluntarily. The Dean of Guild cannot mean, I suppose, that the very sight of a chimney is nauseous and hurtful, and that it would depopulate the place immediately it was put up.

But, then, the question is, is it against the conditions of the feu? and I am of opinion with your Lordship that it is not. We have no concern with the superior, who assents to it, and therefore we only determine under this head that it is not in violation of any obligations put upon the feuar in favour of other feuars upon the Blythswood property. I do not enter into details; I think it is sufficient to state the conclusion, which is in accordance with the opinion which your Lordship has more fully expressed. It would be a sad pity if the ventilation of this underground railway was hindered or delayed merely because the people about Blythswood Square did not like the look of the chimney. If a nuisance should hereafter result, the nuisance must be abated in some way or other.

Your Lordship has noticed what was stated at the bar by the learned counsel, that this erection might be made ornamental and as unlike a chimney as the ingenuity and taste of an architect could devise. I am afraid that it would still maintain its distinctive appearance as a chimney, and I think there had better be no attempt made to disguise it; but there are differences of tastes in such matters, and if harmony can be produced by adopting some style of chimney which would meet with general commendation, there can be no objection to it; but I myself venture most humbly to say that I think there had better be very little attempt made to disguise it. It may be built of stone, if that is thought more beautiful than brick, but I should think it would not be very long before it assumed a colour in which stone would not be distinguishable from brick; but that is of no moment. I agree with your Lordship that the Dean of Guild is wrong, and that the railway company should get the decree sought.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I am bound to follow the case of Hislop, and on the authority of that case I hold that the respondents are not entitled to enforce the conditions contained in the title of the appellants. I think it right, however, to say that I do not read that case as deciding that such a title can be given only by express words. I do not think, however, that it can be inferred from the deeds which are before us in the present case. The case of Hislop was, in my judgment, a much stronger one than the present for holding that the conditions might be enforced by the feuars, but the decision of the House of Lords negatives the existence of any such right.

No. 197.

July 1, 1891.

North British Railway Co. v. Moore.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur with your Lordships in thinking that the Dean of Guild has gone wrong in pronouncing the judgment brought under appeal, and I cannot help saying that the three reasons upon which the judgment seems to have proceeded are each and all of them, in my opinion, quite unsound. The last mentioned, but which evidently bulks most largely and most influentially in the mind of the Dean of Guild, is that the proposed erection would be a nuisance. I think that there he anticipates what is not an ascertained fact; and more than that, that he is assuming a jurisdiction that does not belong to him, because the question, whether this is or may be a nuisance, is one which the Dean of Guild is not competent to try.

The second ground of judgment which I would refer to is, that the railway company are not entitled to do this, because the proposed erection is outwith the limits of their deviation, and because it is against the statute. The Dean of Guild has misapprehended the provisions of the statute entirely. They are not proposing to put up this ventilating-shaft under the statute; they are proposing to build the shaft upon property acquired by them as individual proprietors, and unless there be something in the title to the subjects which excludes their exercising this right as one of the rights of property, then they must be allowed to exercise it.

That brings me to the third and last of the reasons of the Dean of Guild in giving this judgment, which is, that the proposed erection will be foreign to the conditions of feu. Upon that matter I need say no more than that I entirely concur with your Lordships in the views which you have expressed. I think the judgment of the Dean of Guild ought to be recalled and the case remitted back to him, with instructions to grant the lining.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild appealed against: Remit the cause to him with instructions to grant the prayer of the petition."

MILLAR, ROBSON, & Co., S.S.C.—FORRESTER & DAVIDSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 198.

July 1, 1891.

Moncreiff.

THE HON. F. J. MONCREIFF (Factor Loco Tutoris to C D), Petitioner.—Blackburn.

Parent and Child—Factor loco tutoris—Custody of child.—Circumstances in which authority was granted to a factor loco tutoris to detain the person of his ward in Scotland in opposition to the wishes of the ward's father, who was resident abroad.

1ST DIVISION.

C.

A B, a Scotsman, resident in Russia, but not naturalised in that country, married a Russian lady, who died in June 1881, leaving one daughter, C D, born in February 1880. In July 1881 C D was sent to reside with A B's mother in Scotland.

In May 1890 A B's mother presented a petition for the appointment of a factor loco tutoris to C D. She stated that C D's maternal grandfather,

No. 198.
July 1, 1891.
Moncreiff.

E F, had died in Russia in June 1887, and that C D thereby became entitled to certain rights of succession in the estate of the deceased, and that the said "A B, the pupil's father, is in embarrassed circumstances, and in order to the recovery and preservation of the share of the estate of the said E F falling to the said C D, and to the administration thereof for her behoof, it is necessary that a factor loco tutoris should be appointed by your Lordships."

No answers were lodged to this petition, and, on 3d June 1890, the Hon. F. J. Moncreiff, C.A., was appointed factor loco tutoris to C D.

After his appointment the factor granted a power of attorney in favour of Mr Edward Neil Primrose, merchant, St Petersburg, for the purpose of suing in the Russian Courts for C D's share of the inheritance.

Mr Primrose, on taking the usual steps in Russia, was opposed by A B, who appeared in the proceedings and pleaded that, he being the legal guardian of the child, her share of the estate ought to be paid over to him.

Thereafter, on 9th March 1891, the factor presented a note to the Court setting forth these facts, and further stating,—"It is believed that the Russian Courts have declined to recognise the right of the said A B to receive the inheritance of the said C D, so long as she remains out of his custody, and he has therefore intimated to her that she will require to come to Russia in May next in order to reside with him there. . . . The factor is of opinion that it would be highly prejudicial to the interests of the said ward that she should be intrusted to the custody or control of her father, and he is also advised that, on account of her constitution and the state of her health generally, residence in Russia would endanger her life." A certificate as to her health was appended, and the note craved the Court to grant authority to the factor to detain the person of his ward in Scotland, and under his custody.

On 11th March 1891 the Court pronounced an interlocutor ordering the note to be served on A B, and answers to be lodged in fourteen days, and "further, as craved in said note, direct and ordain the said factor loco tutoris to detain the person of the said C D in the meantime, and till the further orders of the Court."

On 1st July the factor moved the Court to confirm the interim order of 11th March.

He stated that attempts to serve the note on A B personally had failed; that on 21st April the factor wrote to A B through his Edinburgh agents enclosing a print of the note and registering the letter; that no answer had been received, but that on 2d June A B had written to his mother, and had incidentally mentioned that he had received a copy of the note.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the note for the factor loco tutoris, No. 7 of process, renew the order of 11th March 1891."

RUSSELL & DUNLOP, W.S., Agents.

GEORGE TAYLOR & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Asher—Wallace.
GLASGOW AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders Respondents.—D.-F. Balfour—Guthrie.

No. 199.

July 3, 1891.

Taylor & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

Railway—Agreements and contracts—Rates—Preference.—A railway company agreed with a coalmaster to carry his coals to Ayr at the following lump rates:—From A (two miles) at 6d. per ton, from B (six miles), from C (seven miles), and from D (eight miles) at 8d. per ton; and that in the event of the railway company carrying coals to Ayr for any other coalmaster at lower rates it should be bound to reduce the rates under the agreement to those lower rates.

In an action raised by the coalmaster for repayment of alleged overcharges the pursuer averred that the railway company had been carrying coals to Ayr from the L. colliery, twenty-three miles distant, for 1s. 7d. per ton, being a rate under 1d. per ton per mile, while the pursuer had been paying, in terms of the agreement, on coals carried from the D pit to Ayr 1d. per mile, and from the B and C pits a higher rate per mile.

Held that the rates fixed by the agreement were lump rates not based on considerations of mileage alone, but graduated according to distance, a higher rate per mile being charged for short distances than for long distances, and that therefore it did not appear from the pursuers' statement that the rates charged against the L. colliery for carriage for twenty-three miles were lower rates than those charged against the pursuers for short distances, and action dismissed as irrelevant.

Mackinnon v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., 12 R. 1309, aff. 13 R. (H. L.) 89, distinguished.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. M.

THE late John Taylor Gordon was lessee of collieries at Enterkine, Sundrum, and Gadgirth, and also at Blackhouse, all in the vicinity of Ayr. He was also lessee of a private railway from Annbank (a name given to the district in which Enterkine, Sundrum, and Gadgirth are situated) to Ayr.

In 1864 the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company promoted in Parliament a bill to enable them, inter alia, to make certain railways in Ayrshire. In connection therewith the company and Mr Gordon entered into an agreement, dated 27th and 28th February 1865, which provided as to the traffic from the above-named collieries of Mr Gordon (who was the second party to the agreement) to Ayr and Troon. The fifth article of this agreement provided as follows as to rates:—"Fifth, The rates payable by the second party to the first party on coal carried on the railways to be made under the authority of the said Act; from Enterkine, Sundrum, and adjacent coalfields to the harbour or other place of sale at Ayr shall be 8d. per ton; from these coalfields to the harbour at Troon, 1s. 5d. per ton; and from Blackhouse to the harbour or other places of sale at Ayr, 6d. per ton." The sixth article was as follows:—"Sixth, To all other places than those above-named (i.e. Ayr and Troon) the rates on coal shall be as follows, namely, for distances not exceeding six miles, 1½d. per ton per mile; for distances exceeding six miles and not exceeding twenty-five miles, 1½d. per ton per mile for the first six miles, and 1d. per ton per mile for the additional distance beyond six miles; for distances exceeding twenty-five miles, the above rates for the first twenty-five miles, and ¾d. per ton per mile for the additional distance beyond twenty-five miles. The above distances shall be calculated at the actual distance from the junction of the second party's private railway with the main line: Provided and declaring always that in the event of the first party charging to any other coalmaster or coalmasters or other parties in the coal trade in competition with the second party rates lower than those fixed by this agreement, then the first party shall be bound to reduce the rates fixed by this and the preceding article to the rates given by them to the said competing parties, which reduced rate shall only continue, however, so long as the said reduced rate is given to said competing parties."

No. 199.
July 3, 1891.
Taylor & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

The bill passed into law, and thereafter the traffic from the collieries was carried over the railway company's line made in virtue thereof.

On 18th June 1890, George Taylor & Co., coalmasters, who claimed to be in right of the agreement, raised an action against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company for declarator that the "defenders are not entitled to carry coals from coalfields further distant from Ayr and Troon than the coalfields mentioned in article 5 of an agreement between the defenders of the first part and John Taylor Gordon, Esquire, of Blackhouse, and then the sole partner of the pursuers' firm of the second part, dated 27th and 28th February 1865, at a lower rate per ton per mile than the pursuers pay under the said article without giving the pursuers a corresponding reduction; and the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained by decree foresaid to make payment to the pursuers (first) of the sum of £25,386, 1s. 11d. sterling of principal, and (second) of the sum of £8348, 17s. of interest thereon, conform to state to be produced at the calling hereof."

The pursuers stated that since 1874 they had sent large quantities of coal to Ayr and Troon, for which they had been charged "the lump rates mentioned in article 5 of the said agreement," and had paid these rates in ignorance of the fact that lower rates were being demanded from and paid by other traders in competition with them since 1874.

It is not necessary to refer to the pursuers' statement of alleged overcharges other than that in—(Cond. 11) ". . . The pursuers aver that the defenders are due and resting owing to them a rebate on the said coal and dross carried for them by the defenders to Ayr, from the beginning of 1874 to the end of 1887, calculated as follows, viz.:—The distance from Lanemark to Ayr Harbour is twenty-three miles. From 1874 to 1887 the defenders have charged the proprietors of Lanemark Colliery for the carriage of their coal and dross from that colliery to Ayr Harbour at the rate of 1s. 7d. per ton, or $\frac{1}{2}\frac{8}{3}$d. per ton per mile. The pursuers' pits are severally distant from Ayr Harbour six, seven, and eight miles, and during the said period the defenders have charged the pursuers for the carriage of their coal and dross the rate of 8d. per ton, or 1$\frac{1}{3}$d. per ton per mile in the case of the six mile pits, 1$\frac{1}{7}$d. per ton per mile in the case of the seven mile pits, and 1d. per ton per mile in the case of the eight mile pits. The pursuers were thus, as compared with Lanemark, overcharged on said coal and dross sent to Ayr from their six mile pits at the rate of 3$\frac{1}{2}\frac{1}{3}$d. per ton, from their seven mile pits at the rate of 2$\frac{4}{7}$d. per ton, and from their eight mile pits at the rate of 1$\frac{2}{3}\frac{8}{3}$d. per ton. The sum due and resting owing to the pursuers by the defenders in respect of said overcharge amounts to £26,311, 14s. 9d., conform to detailed statement No. 5 herewith produced and referred to." (Cond. 13) "The pursuers aver that the rates fixed in article 5 of the agreement were for convenience arrived at on the average distance of the coalfields from Ayr and Troon and were intended to be lower than they would have been had they been reckoned by the mileage scale in article 6, or by any other lower scale to which pursuers were entitled, in conformity with the provisions of that article. The defenders contend that the rates in article 5 must be regarded as fixed irrespective of distance or scale, and as they decline to make the rebate asked for by the pursuers this action has been rendered necessary."

The defenders, inter alia, pleaded;—(2) The pursuers' averments are not relevant to support the conclusions of the summons.

No. 199.

July 3, 1891.
Taylor & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

From the statements and admissions of parties and from a map produced, it appeared that of the pursuers' collieries Blackhouse was two miles from Ayr, Enterkine was six, Sundrum seven, Gadgirth eight. Lanemark Colliery was about twenty-three miles from Ayr.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 30th January 1891, sustained the defenders' second plea in law, and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—In this action the pursuers, who are a firm of coalmasters in Ayrshire, seek to recover from the defenders, the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, certain alleged overcharges for the carriage of coal, the said overcharges extending over the period since 1874, and amounting in gross to upwards of £25,000. The claim is based upon the provisions of a certain agreement made in the year 1865 between the defenders and the pursuers' late partner and author, Mr John Taylor Gordon, and, according to the pursuers, it is a claim analogous to that sustained by this Court and the House of Lords against the same defenders, in the case of Mackinnon v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, 12 R. 1309, and 13 R. (H. L.) 89.

"The agreement in question was made between the defenders and the late Mr Taylor Gordon, in consideration—as I think sufficiently appears—of the latter supporting a certain railway bill which the defenders were at the time promoting, and in consideration also of Mr Gordon undertaking to send along the proposed line of railway the whole traffic from his pits in the vicinity of Ayr. It is an agreement which contained a variety of provisions, and conferred various privileges on Mr Taylor Gordon, but, in the view I take of the case, it is only necessary to refer to those provisions which directly bear on the alleged overcharges.

"The provisions in question are contained in the fifth and sixth clauses, both quoted at length in the record.

"The fifth clause applied to traffic with Ayr and Troon, and the rates which it provided were lump rates—that is to say, the defenders undertook to carry Mr Gordon's coal from his pits at Enterkine, Sundrum, and adjacent coal fields, to the town and harbour of Ayr at a lump rate of 8d. per ton; from these coalfields to Troon at a lump rate of 1s. 5d. per ton; and from Blackhouse to the town and harbour of Ayr at a lump rate of 6d. per ton.

"The sixth clause applied to traffic to all other places than Ayr and Troon, and its rates were fixed on a different principle, viz., that of a mileage rate graduated according to distance, the lower distances being charged a higher and the longer distances a lower rate per ton per mile. It is not necessary to recite the particular charges, but at the end of the clause occurs the following provision, out of which the present question arises:—'Provided and declaring always that in the event of the first party charging to any other coalmaster or coalmasters or other parties in the coal trade in competition with the second party rates lower than those fixed by this agreement, then the first party shall be bound to reduce the rates fixed by this and the preceding article to the rates given by them to the said competing parties, which reduced rate shall only continue, however, so long as the said reduced rate is given to said competing parties.'

"It is not disputed that this proviso falls to be read as applying both to clauses 5 and 6, that is to say both to Ayr and Troon traffic on the one hand, and to general traffic on the other. Nor is it disputed that for the purposes of the present question its effect is the same as if, at the end of article 5, there had been added a declaration that in the event of the railway company charging to any competing coalmasters rates lower than those fixed by article 5, the railway company should be bound to reduce the rates fixed by article 5 to the rates so charged to the said competing coalmasters.

"The question at the present stage is whether the pursuers have relevantly averred that a certain rate charged to a certain competing coalmaster, viz., the Lanemark Coal Company, for the carriage of coal to Ayr is a lower rate than the rate or rates to Ayr charged to the pursuers under the said fifth article. That is to say, the question is whether what is averred on record with respect

No. 199.

July 3, 1891.
Taylor & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—A proof should be allowed. The Lord Ordinary said that the pursuers had presented no standard of comto the Lanemark rate stamps it as being in the sense of the agreement a lower rate than the pursuers' rates under article 5. I have come to be of opinion that this question must be answered in the negative.

---

"The facts which have to be kept in view, I think, are these—The pursuers' pits at Enterkine, Sundrum, and Gadgirth, to which the 8d. rate applies, are situated at varying distances from Ayr and Ayr harbour, the distances being, as is admitted, respectively, six, seven, and eight miles. The distance from Blackhouse to Ayr, the rate for which is 6d., is not set out on record, but the map produced shews it to be about two miles or perhaps less. The distance from Lanemark Colliery to Ayr Harbour is on the other hand said to be twenty-three miles, and the rate charged to the Lanemark Company is said to be 1s. 7d. per ton. It is not necessary, in the meantime, to go into the figures with respect to Troon traffic, except perhaps to say that the distances from the pursuers' pits to Troon range from fourteen to sixteen miles.

"In this state of the facts, one thing is at the outset clear, viz., that the Lanemark rate to Ayr is not absolutely lower than the agreement rate. It (the Lanemark rate) is 1s. 7d., while the highest agreement rate is 8d. I do not, of course, suggest that this is conclusive. On the contrary, I quite see the difficulty of holding that when the agreement speaks of 'lower rates' it means rates absolutely lower than the agreement rates. For one thing, the agreement has for Ayr traffic, not one, but two rates, viz., 8d. for Enterkine and 6d. for Blackhouse, and if the question were one of absolute rates, the inquiry would always be, which of the two was the rate to be compared? It is not, however, necessary to consider how far this difficulty is insuperable. It is enough to note that in whatever other sense the Lanemark rate may be lower than the agreement rate, it is not, and cannot be said to be lower absolutely.

"The point, therefore, really is, whether the Lanemark rate is relatively lower than the agreement rate, or rather the agreement rates. And this involves the question whether the pursuers have been able to point to any common standard of comparison applicable to both rates, and tested by which the Lanemark rate is higher than the agreement rates. After the best consideration I have been able to give to the pursuers' record, I am of opinion that they have failed to set forth any such common standard of comparison,—that is to say, that they have failed to indicate any scale or standard capable of being applied to the two rates in contrast and capable of being so applied consistently with the true construction of the agreement.

"Their first suggestion is that the two rates fall to be compared simply according to mileage; that is to say, they suggest that the agreement lump rate of 8d. falls to be broken up into as many rates as there are pits at different distances within the defined district, and that the rate per mile being for each pit thus ascertained, that rate falls for each pit to be compared with the Lanemark rate (1s. 7d. for twenty-three miles), which is equal to 19/23ds of a penny per mile. The result is to exhibit the Lanemark rate as lower relatively than any of the agreement rates, the latter being, in the case of the eight mile pits, 1d. per ton per mile; in the case of the seven mile pits, 1 1/7d.; in the case of the six mile pits, 1 1/6d.; and in the case of Blackhouse (which is close to Ayr), about 3d. per ton per mile.

"In my opinion, this method of calculation is illegitimate. A simple mileage standard is not, in my opinion, applicable to the pursuers' rates under article 5. It cannot, I think, be held that the parties to the agreement intended that the rates under article 5 should be judged by such a standard. Nothing seems plainer than that the rates in question were fixed altogether irrespective of mileage. The 8d. rate applies equally whether the pits are distant eight miles or seven miles or six miles, and would equally apply if pits were opened within the district mentioned ten miles or twelve miles from Ayr. Moreover, the 6d. (Blackhouse) rate is, judged by mileage, about three times higher than the 8d. rate, and altogether, it is quite obvious that article 5 proceeded on the principle, first (as be-parison between their agreement rate and the Lanemark rate. But the proper method was to reduce both to a mileage rate, and then compare tween the 8d. and 6d. rates), of charging higher rates per mile for short distances than for long; and next (as among the various pits within the Enterkine and Sundrum district), of ignoring mileage altogether. How, in these circumstances, it can be predicated that the Lanemark rate, being 19/23ds of a penny per mile for twenty-three miles, is a lower rate, in the sense of the agreement, than either or both of the pursuers' rates under article 5, I do not understand. It is impossible to say what would have been the agreement rate for twenty-three miles had the pursuers' district extended to that radius. Judged by the difference between the two rates stipulated, it is quite possible that for so long a distance the rate would have been quite as low as the Lanemark rate.

No. 199.

July 3, 1891.

Taylor & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

"In point of fact (apart from the difficulty of at all breaking up lump rates into mileage rates, and apart also from the difficulty that, when so broken up, the result is not one, but several, mileage rates), the pursuers' contention involves—as it seems to me—this cardinal absurdity. It assumes that rates for long distances were—according to the intention of the parties to this agreement—to be charged for at the same rate per mile as short distances. But this is contrary to all practice and all experience, and the absurdity is well illustrated by taking the 6d. rate from Blackhouse, and applying the pursuers' principle to that rate. The result would be that, because Lanemark (twenty-three miles), gets a rate of 1s. 7d., the Blackhouse rate (two miles), would have to be reduced from 6d. to something like 1½d. in gross, or ¾d. per ton per mile, notwithstanding that for distances under six miles the minimum rate shewn on any of the tables or scales produced is 1½d. per ton per mile.

"It appeared to be thought that the adoption of a simple mileage standard receives support from the case of Mackinnon. That, however, is not so. The pursuers in that case were themselves charged according to a mileage scale graduated according to distance, and there was no difficulty in applying that scale, both to the pursuers' traffic and to the traffic of the competing traders who were said to have got lower rates. Accordingly, what was there done was first to compare the lower rate complained of with the rate which, according to the graduated mileage scale, was the appropriate rate, and then to reduce the pursuers' rate proportionately to the difference between the appropriate rate and the actual rate charged to the competing traders. This method was obviously legitimate, and made full allowance for the diminution of the mileage rate according to distance. And accordingly all that was struck at in Mackinnon's case was an undue diminution in the mileage rate, which the difference in distance did not justify. There was no suggestion in that case of a simple mileage standard such as is suggested here. The question was between rates absolutely lower, and rates relatively lower according to a prescribed and graduated mileage scale; and what the Court held was only this, that where 'lower rates' are mentioned in an agreement for rates fixed according to mileage, the reference is not to rates absolutely lower, but rates relatively lower according to the prescribed mileage standard.

"I reject, therefore, as quite inadmissible the pursuers' first standard of comparison. But, apparently conscious of the difficulties which I have pointed out, the pursuers have on record suggested two other standards of comparison in the shape of two graduated scales or schedules which they find in force on the defenders' system, and by means of which they seek to perform the same comparison as was properly and successfully performed in the case of Mackinnon."—(His Lordship held these to be inapplicable to the pursuers' and the Lanemark traffic, and concluded thus):—

"I therefore find that the pursuers have failed to set out any facts or figures which imply or enable me to affirm that the Lanemark rate is lower than all or any of the pursuers' rates under article 5. And this is tantamount to saying that the pursuers have not stated a relevant case, and that their action must be thrown out. I have not found it necessary to decide—and indeed it is impossible to do so by anticipation—what exactly the agreement means when it speaks of

No. 199.
July 3, 1891.
Taylor & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

them.[1] Here two lump rates were found. The pursuers paid 8d. per ton for eight miles, Lanemark colliery, 1s. 7d. for twenty-three miles, the same eight miles, plus fifteen. The meaning of the agreement was that when another trader was charged less per mile for any distance, the pursuers' rate should be reduced so as to be on an equality therewith.

Argued for defenders;—The pursuers must be able to shew a standard of comparison between their rates and Lanemark rates or Kilmarnock scale. They failed to do so. In Mackinnon's case, which they represented as an authority for them, there was such a standard.

THE COURT adhered.

MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 200.
July 3, 1891.*
Smith v. Smiths.

MISS MARY SMITH (Melville Smith's Executor), First Party.
MISS MARY SMITH AND OTHERS (Melville Smith's heirs in mobilibus), Second Parties.—Goudy—Cullen.
WILLIAM SMITH AND OTHERS (George Greig Smith's heirs in mobilibus), Third Parties.—C. K. Mackenzie—Hunter.

Foreign—Succession—Interpretation of Settlement.—Lex domicilii—Lex loci actus.—Questions as to the interpretation of a mortis causa deed disposing of moveable estate must be solved by the law of the domicile of the granter of the deed, unless the deed shall disclose an intention on the part of its granter that some other law should be invoked.

Circumstances which were held to be insufficient to displace the general rule.

2D DIVISION. M.

MELVILLE BABINGTON SMITH, who was born in Scotland in 1838, emigrated to New Zealand in 1862, and between that year and 1881 carried on business partly in New Zealand and partly in Scotland, making several visits to Scotland. In 1881 he bought, along with his brother George, a sheep farm, called Pouparæ, in New Zealand. He and his brother George in 1885 left New Zealand for Scotland on a visit, and before starting both employed a solicitor in Gisborne, New Zealand, to make their wills, which they executed there. George died in Scotland in 1886 leaving children, and Melville returned to New Zealand to sell Pouparæ. He sold it and started for Scotland, but died in New York in 1887 without children. His will, made at Gisborne, was found in his portmanteau.

It ran in the following terms, viz.:—"This is the last will and testament of me, Melville Babington Smith, of Pouparæ, in the district of Poverty Bay, in the colony of New Zealand, sheep farmer: I hereby revoke all other wills or testamentary documents at any time heretofore made by me, and declare this to be my last will and testament: I appoint my friend, Alexander Mackenzie of Ormond, sheep farmer, and David Kirkpatrick of Poverty Bay, sheep farmer (hereinafter called 'my said trustees'), to be trustees and executors of this my will: I give and bequeath the sum of £100 sterling to my sister-in-law, Mary Ann Smith, wife of Well-lower rates. It may be that in some future case rates may come into controversy the amounts and conditions of which may make it possible, or even easy, to affirm that they are lower than the agreement rates. But for the purposes of the present case it is, I think, enough that the Lanemark rate complained of is not shewn to be a lower rate in the sense of the agreement, assuming everything to be true which the pursuers aver."

---

[1] Mackinnon v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., July 15, 1885, 12 R. 1309, June 23, 1886, 13 R. (H. L.) 89; Dalmellington Iron Co., Feb. 26, 1889, 16 R. 523.

* Decided June 6, 1891.

No. 200.

July 3, 1891.
Smith v. Smiths.

wood Smith; the sum of £100 sterling to my niece, Ellen Smith, wife of Richard Corrie; £100 sterling to Carlaw Smith of Gisborne, auctioneer; and £25 sterling to each of my said executors: And I give, devise, and bequeath all the rest, residue, and remainder of my real and personal estate, of whatsoever nature and kind soever, unto my said trustees upon trust, to sell and convert the same into money, and out of the proceeds of such sale and conversion, in the first place, to pay all my just debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, and then to pay the residue thereof in manner following, namely:—One-third of such nett proceeds to my brother George Greig Smith, and his heirs absolutely; one other third to my brother, James Smith, of Park End, Lochmaben, Scotland; and the remaining one-third equally between my sisters Jane Smith and Mary Smith, as tenants in common: And I devise unto my said trustees all estates vested in me as trustee or mortgagee, according to the equities thereof.—In witness whereof, I have to this, my last will and testament, set my hand this 6th day of February 1885."

The trustees named declined to act, and the deceased's two sisters were appointed executors-dative. Jane subsequently died, and Mary was left sole executor.

Since George had predeceased his brother, a question now arose on the construction of the terms of the bequest "to my brother, George Greig Smith, and his heirs absolutely." If these words were construed by the law of New Zealand, there was, since George himself had predeceased, a lapse, and Melville's next of kin took the legacy. If, on the other hand, the law of Scotland ruled, then George's children, as being his heirs in mobilibus, took.

A special case was presented to the Court by (1) Melville Smith's executor, as holder of the fund; (2) his next of kin; and (3) George's children and heirs in mobilibus.

The case put to the Court as the first question whether under the circumstances there set out Melville was domiciled in Scotland or in New Zealand, but on reference being made to the case of Lawson's Trustees v. Lawson, July 4, 1883, 10 R. 1084, where it was laid down that a question as to domicile, being a question of fact, could not be decided by the Court on a special case, it was admitted for the second parties that Melville had died a domiciled Scot.

That being admitted, the question came to be,—"Does the law of Scotland or the law of New Zealand regulate his testamentary succession?"

Argued for the second parties;—Recent decisions had confined the function of the lex domicilii within narrower limits than were at one time assigned to it.[1] Lord Kingsdown's Act[2] had sanctioned the execution of a testament in conformity with the lex loci actus. In Mitchell & Baxter's case[3] the considerations which would suffice to introduce a rule of law other than that of domicile were pointed out. The domicile here was in England. Against that the place of execution was Scotland, the deed was drawn by a Scots writer, two of the trustees were Scotsmen, the other being the testator's husband. The fund dealt with was a fund held under a Scots trust over which the testator had a power of appointment, and the language of the deed was technical Scots language. So here the place of execution was New Zealand, the deed was drawn there by a New Zealand solicitor, the trustees were New Zealanders, and the estate dealt with was real estate in New Zealand. There were besides several

[1] M'Laren on Wills and Succession, i., p. 39.
[2] 24 and 25 Vict. c. 114.
[3] Mitchell & Baxter v. Davies, Dec. 3, 1875, 3 R. 208.

No. 200.

July 8, 1891. Smith v. Smiths.

technical expressions of New Zealand law used. When, then, the question was put, what is the meaning of the expression "to my brother George and his heirs absolutely," the only person who could answer that was the New Zealand solicitor, who would answer in terms of his own law. He could speak no other law language than that of New Zealand, and therefore the law of New Zealand must tell the executor what to do in the case which had happened. There were several cases which went to establish that the presumption in favour of the law of the domicile might be overcome.[1] The turning point of the present case was the necessity of interpreting a technical term. To do so you must go to the law of the country to which that term belonged,[2] and that necessarily was the country to which the solicitor who used the language belonged. If it was argued on the other side that it was better to avoid intestacy, and that therefore the Court should adopt the law of Scotland, that was a begging of the whole question. If the law of New Zealand applied, it had reasons, satisfactory to itself, for bringing about intestacy in such circumstances.

Argued for the third parties;—There was no doubt about the general presumption in favour of the lex domicilii as the law that would regulate the succession, testate or intestate, in moveables.[3] This indeed was admitted to be so in the case of Mitchell & Baxter founded on by the other side, and it was remarkable that in none of the cases cited on the other side except Mitchell & Baxter was effect given to the lex loci actus against the lex domicilii. These two were identical in all the cases cited, the rival being either the lex fori or the lex rei sitæ. Hence any observations were obiter merely. Now, did the circumstances here raise the same case as in Mitchell & Baxter? It was submitted that they came nearer the cases of Anstruther and Bradford,[4] in neither of which was the presumption in favour of the lex domicilii displaced. In Mitchell & Baxter the lady whose deed was in question was by origin Scots, the deed being executed in Scotland, and had only changed her domicile derivatively through her husband. The estate there was a Scots heritable bond, while here the estate was money only. There were highly technical expressions of Scots law used there, while here there was no technicality in the phrase "heirs absolutely." It was absurd to use the law of New Zealand to make a man intestate and then to distribute his estate not under that law, but the law of Scotland, as the second parties here must do if they were successful.

At advising,—

Lord Trayner.—The first question submitted by the parties for the determination of the Court involves a question of fact, and is therefore a question we cannot determine under a special case. But the parties agreed at the bar that it should be held as admitted that Melville Babington Smith was domiciled in Scotland at the date of his death. With that admission I have no hesitation in answering the second question. I am of opinion that Mr Smith's will must

[1] Thomson's Trustees v. Alexander, Dec. 18, 1851, 14 D. 217, 24 Scot. Jur. 101; Ferguson v. Marjoribanks, April 1, 1853, 15 D. 637, 25 Scot. Jur. 376.

[2] Rainsford v. Maxwell, Feb. 6, 1852, 14 D. 450, 24 Scot. Jur. 221; Trotter v. Trotter, June 10, 1829, 3 W. and S. 407.

[3] Story, sec. 479; Bar's International Law, sec. 110; Purvis' Trustees v. Purvis' Executors, March 23, 1861, 23 D. 812, 33 Scot. Jur. 404; Erskine v. Wylie, 1862, 10 H. of L. Ca. p. 1.

[4] Anstruther v. Chalmer, 1826, 2 Simon, p. 1; Bradford v. Young, 1885, L. R., Ch. Div. 29, p. 617.

be construed, and his testamentary succession regulated by the law of Scotland, that being the law of his domicile, and there being nothing in Mr Smith's will, or in the circumstances attending its execution, to indicate any intention on his part that his testamentary succession should be regulated by any other law.

No. 200.
July 3, 1891.
Smith v. Smiths.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT, "in respect the parties by their counsel admit that Melville Babington Smith was domiciled in Scotland at the date of his death, answer in the affirmative the first of the questions stated in the case, and with regard to the second question are of opinion that his testamentary succession is regulated by the law of Scotland."

JAMES FORSYTH, S.S.C.—J. C. & A. STEUART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 201.
July 3, 1891.
Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

MISS JESSE MARY CHAMBERS AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Lorimer—Johnston.
THE EDINBURGH AND GLASGOW AËRATED BREAD COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—M'Kechnie—C. S. Dickson.

Company—Rectification of register—Misrepresentation—Misrepresentation of reason why certain directors had retired—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 35.—The memorandum of association of a company, registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-1886, bore that the registered office of the company would be in England, but in the copy of the memorandum of association printed on the back of the prospectus it was stated that the registered office would be in Scotland. In consequence of this discrepancy no allotment of shares was made, the company was wound up, and a new company was formed, with its registered office in Scotland. The prospectus of the original company bore that Mr Esslemont, M.P., was to be the chairman, and Dr Clark, M.P., one of the directors of that company, and in a circular sent along with the prospectus of the new company to persons who had applied for shares in the original company it was stated, after explaining the necessity for the formation of the new company, that, "as the company will now fall to be managed in Glasgow, Messrs Esslemont and Clark, the two members of Parliament (whose parliamentary duties will prevent their attendance at the board), and Mr M'Cankie [another original director] have retired." This circular then requested the applicants to renew their applications for shares.

Certain persons who had applied for shares in the original company, and had had shares allotted to them in the new company on their renewed application after receiving the above circular, sometime afterwards petitioned the Court to order the removal of their names from the register of the new company. They averred that they had applied for shares on the faith of the representation that Mr Esslemont was to be chairman, and Dr Clark a director of the company; that they had renewed their application only in consequence of the statement that these gentlemen had retired from the board because their parliamentary duties made it impossible for them to attend the meetings of the board in Glasgow; and that this statement was false, and was calculated to deceive, as the true reason why Messrs Esslemont and Clark had retired was that they were dissatisfied with the prospects of the company.

The company denied these averments, and pleaded that they were irrelevant.

The Court refused the petition, holding that as the petitioners had applied for shares after the distinct statement that Messrs Esslemont and Clark were not to go on the board, it was irrelevant to inquire into the truth of the reasons stated for their retirement.

No. 201.

July 3, 1891.
Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

1st Division. C.

In July 1888 a company called the Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Company, Limited, was registered in England under the Companies Acts, 1862-1886. Clause 2 of the memorandum of association bore that the registered office of the company would be situate in England.

In the prospectus of the company, which was issued to the public on 17th December 1888, it was, inter alia, stated that the following gentlemen were to be the chairman and directors of the company, viz.:—(1) Peter Esslemont, Esq., M.P., Aberdeen (chairman); (2) G. B. Clark, Esq., M.P.; (3) William M'G. Burns, Esq., M.D.; (4) John M. Bryce, Esq., Glasgow; (5) John Crawford, Esq., Glasgow; and (6) James M'Cankie, Esq., Edinburgh.

In the copy of the memorandum of association printed on the back of the prospectus, it was stated that the registered office of the company would be situate in Scotland. On this discrepancy being observed by the solicitors of the company they advised the Glasgow directors of the company that they were not in safety to proceed to allotment, and it was arranged that the company should be wound up and a new company formed to be registered in Scotland. The English company was accordingly put into liquidation and a new company formed under the same name, with a registered office in Scotland.

On 31st December 1888 a circular was issued to those who had applied for shares in the English company by the interim secretary of that company, stating, inter alia, that "owing to a verbal error in the memorandum of association" to the effect that "the registered office of the company would be situate in England, instead of in Scotland," it had been found necessary to register the company in Scotland, and to manage the business in Glasgow; that the company had accordingly been registered in Scotland; and that "as the company will now fall to be managed in Glasgow, Messrs Esslemont and Clark, the two Members of Parliament (whose parliamentary duties will prevent their attendance at the board), and Mr M'Cankie have retired." The circular was accompanied by an altered prospectus, which contained an altered list of directors, and requested parties who had applied for shares to renew their applications.

On 22d January 1891 Jesse Mary Chambers and a number of other persons who had applied for shares in the English company, and had renewed their applications after receiving the second prospectus and accompanying circular, and had had shares allotted to them in the Scottish company, presented a petition for rectification of the register of the latter company by the removal of their names therefrom, and for repayment of the sums paid by them in respect of their shares.

After setting forth the facts regarding the formation of the company above narrated, the petitioners stated:—

"In acquiring shares in the said company as aforesaid the whole of the petitioners acted in the belief that Mr Esslemont had agreed to act as chairman and director of the said company, as set forth in the original prospectus, that he had a good opinion of the company, and that he had retired from the offices of chairman and director only because his parliamentary duties would interfere with his attendance at the meetings of the board in Glasgow, and this belief on the part of the petitioners was induced by the statements and representations made in the said prospectus and circular as before mentioned.

"Mr Esslemont has a very high reputation as a man of business and a financier, and this was well known to the petitioners, and the statements and representations with regard to him made in the prospectus and circular as before set forth were the means of inducing the petitioners to acquire shares, or at least they very materially influenced the petitioners in their decision in the matter.

No. 201.

July 3, 1891. Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

"The petitioners have recently learned, and now aver that, as matter of fact, Mr Esslemont never agreed to act as chairman and director of the company, never gave authority for his name being advertised in the said prospectus as chairman or director, and never authorised the statement in the said circular that he had retired from the board in consequence of inability to attend the meetings of the directors in Glasgow. The change to Glasgow was no part of Mr Esslemont's reason for withdrawing. The promoters and directors of the company (other than Messrs Esslemont, Clark, and M'Cankie) were responsible for the said prospectus and circular, and they knew when the prospectus was issued that Mr Esslemont had not consented to act as chairman and director, and had not authorised them to use his name in the prospectus. At the time when they issued the said circular they knew that Mr Esslemont had repudiated all connection with the company, and that he had done so because he did not approve of the way in which the company had been promoted, the amount paid in promotion-money and the payment for the directors of qualifying shares, and also because he did not believe that the company would be a financial success. He stated these objections to the said promoters and directors, both verbally and in writing, in or about the month of December 1888.

"The prospectus and circular referred to were fraudulently conceived and issued in the terms above mentioned expressly for the purpose of misleading and deceiving applicants for shares, by inducing them to believe that Mr Esslemont had faith in the company, and was willing to lend his name to it, and put money into it, and as matter of fact the petitioners were so misled and deceived, and in consequence applied for shares."

The company lodged answers. They stated that all the arrangements as to the prospectus and formation of the respondents' company, and the applications for shares therein, were known to and approved of by Dr Clark and Mr Esslemont; that the whole statements in the circular and relative prospectus were made bona fide, and were true; and that the petitioners were aware at the time of their application for shares that Mr Esslemont was not to be a director of the company; and they submitted that the petitioners' averments were irrelevant, and, so far as material, unfounded in fact, and that the petition should be refused.

A proof was allowed. The following was the import of the evidence, which was taken before Lord M'Laren:—Early in the summer of 1888 Mr Esslemont was asked by Messrs Turner and Dermer, who were the promoters of the company, whether he would join the board as chairman. He had several meetings with these gentlemen, but would give no positive answer. He deponed that his impressions of the company were at first favourable, but gradually grew less favourable. Ultimately he arranged with Dr Clark that Dr Clark should visit Glasgow to make inquiries and report to him. Dr Clark never reported to Mr Esslemont, but on 16th December 1888 the latter received the following letter from Mr Turner:—"I understand from Mr Dermer, who arrived from Glasgow this morning with Dr Clark, that you have definitely assented to take the chairmanship of our company, subject to the requisition from the directors, which I enclose herewith, and which you will notice includes the signature of Dr Clark. I have therefore given directions for the prospectus (approved by the other directors) to be printed in form enclosed herewith. It is proposed to advertise on Tuesday. Will you kindly leave a note here, which I will call for this evening about eight o'clock, stating your approval. I am sorry to trouble you to-day, but I understand you are leaving London to-night for Scotland." Mr Esslemont did not reply to this letter, but the prospectus was published with his name as chairman.

No. 201.
July 8, 1891.
Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

On 27th December a meeting of the directors was held in Glasgow. Mr Esslemont was present, but declined to take the chair. He complained that his name had been published as chairman without his consent. It did not appear that anyone took the chair at that meeting, and a general discussion ensued as to promotion-money and other matters. Mr Esslemont stated that he would join the board only on certain conditions which he stated, and among them that Mr Gourlay, accountant, should be appointed to investigate into the propriety of the sums charged for the promotion of the company. This was agreed to, and the meeting adjourned until the following day. At the adjourned meeting a somewhat heated discussion occurred, the result of which was that Mr Esslemont intimated that he would not become a director, and left the room. After he had left Dr Clark stated that as Mr Esslemont declined to act he also did not wish to remain on the board (there was no dispute that Dr Clark had agreed to join). The question then arose as to how these changes in the list of the directorate should be published, and it was ultimately agreed to make the intimation contained in the circular above quoted. Three of those present deponed that this was done in consequence of what Dr Clark had said regarding himself, but Dr Clark deponed that he had no recollection of making any such statement. Both he and Mr Esslemont stated that they did not retire because their parliamentary duties in London would prevent them from attending to the business of the company in Glasgow. Mr Esslemont deponed,—"When I saw the statement in the circular issued to shareholders relative to the reason of my resignation, I wrote a letter to the company repudiating it." Mr David Craig, a partner of Craig & Risk, the company's solicitors, deponed that he and Mr Turner called upon Messrs Colquhoun, the agents for Mr Esslemont and Dr Clark, and shewed the draft circular with the proposed clause relating to the withdrawal of these gentlemen from the company, and that it was approved of by Mr James Colquhoun. Mr James Colquhoun deponed that he did not revise the circular, and had no authority to do so, and that he understood that the whole object of shewing him the circular was that he might be made aware that in the circular to be issued the fact of Mr Esslemont and Dr Clark being no longer directors was made public.

Most of the petitioners were examined. They deponed that they had taken their shares on the faith of Mr Esslemont's name and also of Dr Clark's in the original prospectus and of the intimation in the second prospectus; but it did not appear that any of the petitioners knew much about either Mr Esslemont or Dr Clark, except from inquiries or consultation of directories, &c.

It appeared that the circumstances founded on by the petitioners were not publicly known till about the end of 1889, when an article on the subject appeared in a financial newspaper.

Argued for the petitioners;—There had been such misrepresentation on behalf of the company as entitled the petitioners to repudiate their contract to take shares. The misrepresentation consisted in publishing the statement that Esslemont and Clark had retired from the directorate because they were unable from their parliamentary duties to attend the meetings in Glasgow. That representation was false, in the first place, in regard to Esslemont at anyrate, because he had never agreed to become a director of the original company, and, in the second place, in regard to both, because it was not the true reason of their refusal to join the Scottish company, assuming that they had agreed to join the board of the original company. The mere giving of a false reason for a director's retirement might not entitle a shareholder to rescind his contract; the true reason might be a matter entirely personal to the director; but where the true reason was—as the evidence established it was here—that the director had doubts as to the probable success of the company, then, to publish as his reason that he had not time to attend to the affairs of the company, was to publish a misrepresentation as to a material fact which was calculated to mislead the public into taking shares in the company; and persons who had taken shares in reliance on the truth of the representation were entitled to rescind their contract as soon as they discovered the misrepresentation. It was settled that the publication of certain persons' names as directors of a company might be a most material circumstance to induce persons to join the company, which, if the publication were false in fact, would entitle persons who had taken shares on the faith of these names to repudiate.[1] The same reasoning applied to a case like the present, where, although there were no actual names erroneously included in the second list of directors, there were names published in such a way as to amount to a certificate of confidence in the company by the persons named. That was really the same thing as publishing these persons as directors. It was true that the company was not bound to give any reasons why certain directors had retired, and had the company followed that course here, it could not be doubted that the intending shareholders would have inquired into the reason why such persons as Messrs Esslemont and Clark had retired. The effect of such a statement as that here complained of was to mislead the public into making no such inquiry. The petitioners did not require to establish a case of fraudulent misrepresentation; they were entitled to rescind if there had been misrepresentation of a material fact (on which they had relied), although that misrepresentation had not been fraudulent.[2]

No. 201.

July 3, 1891. Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—There had been no misrepresentation here. It was clear that Clark had agreed to join the original company, and the fair inference from the evidence was that Esslemont had done so also. Then, as to the truth of the reason given for their retirement, three witnesses stated that Clark had given that reason at the meeting after Esslemont had left, and his evidence on that point was only non memini. According to his own account, his only ground for retiring was that Esslemont had retired. Then, as to Esslemont, it was difficult to say why he had retired, but neither his solicitor nor he himself had taken any objection to the statement on which the petitioners founded; and it rather appeared that he had retired because he could not get on with some of the other directors. At anyrate, the petitioners had failed to establish that his reason was that he had doubts as to the stability of the company, and if they failed to establish that, their case failed. But assuming that there had been the misrepresentation complained of, the petitioners, nevertheless, were not entitled to relief, unless they established that they relied on the names of Esslemont and Clark—one or both—in taking shares.[3] In exceptional cases such reliance might be presumed. If, for example, the name of a Rothschild was erroneously published in a list of

[1] Smith v. Chadwick, 1882, L. R., 20 Chanc. Div. 27 (aff. on other points 1884, L. R., 9 H. L. 187); In re Scottish Petroleum Co., 1883, L. R., 23 Chanc. Div. 413.

[2] Cases supra; Reese River Silver Mining Co. v. Smith, 1869, L. R., 4 Eng. and Ir. App. 64.

[3] Smith v. Chadwick, supra, note 1.

No. 201.

July 3, 1891.
Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

directors, persons who had taken shares would probably be entitled to rescind without proving that they had specially relied on that name. The present case was not of that sort, and therefore it was necessary to prove that the petitioners had relied on Messrs Esslemont and Clark being directors. Now, as regarded Clark, there was practically no such evidence; and, as regarded Esslemont, it was for the most part of a very general character. None of the petitioners knew Esslemont personally, or knew anything about him, except what they had learned from chance inquiries. Again, the petitioners had taken their shares on the clear understanding that Esslemont and Clark were not to be directors. Therefore the misrepresentation—if it was a misrepresentation—as to their reasons for retiring was irrelevant. Lastly, they had delayed unduly in bringing this petition. The repudiation must be immediate on the facts coming to the knowledge of the shareholders,[1] which it had not been here.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application under section 35 of the Companies Act of 1862 to have the names of the petitioners removed from the register of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Company, Limited. It appears that in July 1888 a company was incorporated under that name, and that by the second clause of the memorandum of association of that company it was provided that the registered office should be in England; but the copy of the memorandum of association printed on the back of the prospectus of the company, which was issued to the public in December 1888, stated that the registered office of the company was to be in Scotland. When this discrepancy was discovered by the solicitors of the company, they advised the Glasgow directors of the company that they were not in safety to proceed to allotment, and it was arranged that the original company, which may be called the English company, should be wound up, and that a new company, which should have its registered office in Scotland, should be formed. And this accordingly was done. The English company was wound up, and the new or Scottish company came into existence in place of the English company, and under the same name. It is from the register of this second company that the petitioners desire their names to be deleted.

It appears that the prospectus of the English company bore that Mr Esslemont, M.P., was to be chairman, and Dr Clark, M.P., one of the directors of that company, but the prospectus of the Scottish company does not contain the names of either of these gentlemen as members of the board of that—I mean the Scottish—company, and in a circular which was issued at the same time as the prospectus of the Scottish company it is stated that, "as the company will now fall to be managed in Glasgow, Messrs Esslemont and Clark, the two members of Parliament (whose parliamentary duties will prevent their attendance at the board), and Mr M'Cankie have retired." Now, what the petitioners say is, that they relied upon these two gentlemen, Messrs Esslemont and Clark, joining the company and becoming directors, and that they would not have joined the company but for the confidence which they had in the administrative and financial abilities of these gentlemen, particularly Mr Esslemont; and if this application had been made during the existence of the English company one

[1] Lawrence's case, L. R., 2 Chanc. 412; Wilkinson's case, L. R., 2 Chanc. 536; In re Scottish Petroleum Co. supra, p. 1043, note 1.

No. 201.
July 3, 1891.
Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

could have understood the complaint of the petitioners, but that is not so. It is not from the English but from the Scottish company that the petitioners desire to withdraw. The reason which is assigned for Mr Esslemont and Dr Clark not becoming members of the company is that their parliamentary duties in London would prevent them from attending to the business of the company in Glasgow. The petitioners say there were other reasons why Mr Esslemont in particular refused to become connected with the Scottish company, but I do not think the Court has anything to do with that. It may or may not have been convenient for Messrs Esslemont and Clark to attend the meetings of the board in Glasgow, or they may have retired for reasons known to themselves which they were under no obligation to disclose to anyone. The important matter, as far as the present application is concerned, is, that the petitioners cannot say that they were entitled to rely on Messrs Esslemont and Clark becoming directors of the new company, because they were distinctly informed by the circular of 31st December 1888 that these gentlemen would not be directors, and this circular was in the hands of the petitioners before they sent in their applications for shares in the new company. It appears to me that this circular is conclusive of the whole matter against the petitioners, for it puts the new state of matters fully and distinctly before them, and it was only after receiving this circular that they applied for the shares which they now seek to repudiate. The circular told the petitioners everything they were entitled to know, and their only complaint is, that Messrs Esslemont and Clark did not disclose to the petitioners, and to all the world, all the reasons they had for declining to become connected with the Scottish company. I think that is an untenable proposition, and therefore I am for refusing the petition.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking that there is no substance in the reasons which have been assigned by the petitioners for having their names removed from the register of shareholders of this company. As your Lordships are aware, I heard the proof, and I was so much impressed with the want of reality in the case, that at the close of the proof I ventured to suggest to counsel to consider whether it was worth their while to incur the expense of printing, because it was impossible, after listening to the evidence, not to see what the inevitable result must be.

I understand that what the petitioners rely upon is, that the circular of 31st December 1888, while stating that Messrs Esslemont and Clark were no longer to be directors of the company, gave a reason for their declinature to join the board which was not the true reason, and was moreover a reason which left shareholders in the belief that these gentlemen, although they had found it necessary to retire, nevertheless continued to approve of the plans and prospects of the company. Now, it seems to me to be a strong thing to say that a company is to be held responsible for all the inferences, however extravagant, that may be drawn from its circulars. I think it is sufficient if it is held responsible for the truth of the facts which it publishes. Here the fact was that Mr Esslemont and Dr Clark had retired. What their reasons for taking that step may have been appears to me to be altogether immaterial to the purpose of the circular, and after all the evidence which I have heard I am still very much in the dark as to Mr Esslemont's true reasons. He seems to have hesitated a good deal about joining the company, although he had been in negotiation with the promoters for some months, and had invited Dr Clark to go to Glasgow to report to him on the subject. Dr Clark's opinion was favourable, yet when Mr Esslemont received a letter stating that a list of directors would be published, and asking whether it might be assumed that he would be one of them, he returned no answer. In these circumstances I cannot but say that the promoters were quite entitled to assume that Mr Esslemont meant to carry out his provisional arrangement with them and become a member of the board. No doubt they were under a misapprehension; for even after his name had been published on the list of directors as the chairman of the company, he does not seem to have made up his mind. Instead of writing to say that he would not act, he went to Glasgow and attended the first meeting of the board, which he had no right to do unless as a member of the board. It appears, however, that he went there to ascertain whether the company was constituted on a sound basis, and he made the suggestion that an accountant should be appointed to go into the expenditure of the promotion-money. That was quite right, and all the other directors were of the same mind. Mr Esslemont's nominee was appointed accountant; but at the adjourned meeting on the following day Mr Esslemont was still dissatisfied, and while his proposals were under discussion, it appears that in consequence of an altercation between himself and another of the directors, he left the room, declaring that he would have nothing more to do with the company. I cannot say that, even upon his own evidence, he left for any reason connected with the stability or commercial value of the company. He appears to have left for reasons of a purely personal character with which the public had nothing to do. Naturally some remarks were made after he had left as to how the matter was to be put into the circular; and three gentlemen who were present have deponed that Dr Clark suggested that the best way to deal with it, so far as he was concerned, was to state that his parliamentary duties in London made it difficult for him to attend the meetings of the board in Glasgow, and this reason, which applied to Dr Clark, applied also to Mr Esslemont. The other directors did not know of any other reason, because no other reason was stated to them. They had Dr Clark's authority for the statement made regarding him; and the circular was shewn to the gentleman appointed by Mr Esslemont as his agent, and was approved by him. It was afterwards shewn to Mr Esslemont, and while he made some demur as to the statement of the reason, he said he would not object to the circular going out in these terms.

No. 201.

July 3, 1891.
Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

It therefore appears to me that there was neither fraud on the part of the directors or the salaried officials of this company, nor even innocent misrepresentation of such a character as would entitle the petitioners to be relieved of their responsibility as shareholders of the company on the ground of error in essentialibus. The reason assigned for the retirement of Mr Esslemont and Dr Clark appears to me to belong to the category of conventional excuses, which a person gives when he deems it proper to assign some reason for his conduct, although his real reasons may have been indisputably a private affair of his own. It is quite understood that such conventional reasons need not be the true reasons. The fact that Messrs Esslemont and Clark had retired was all that the public had any legitimate concern with, and that fact having been duly intimated, the petitioners cannot be said to have taken their shares in reliance upon these gentlemen being on the board. I do not think that the intimation of a conventional reason for their retirement constitutes any guarantee on the part of those making it that Messrs Esslemont and Clark continued of the same mind as regards the probable future of the company as they are assumed to have been when they agreed to join the board.

No. 201.

July 3, 1891.

Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

LORD KINNEAR.—If the petitioners had been induced to take shares on the representation that Messrs Esslemont and Clark were to be the chairman and a director of the company respectively, and in the belief, founded on personal knowledge, that these gentlemen would not give their names to any concern of the soundness of which they were not satisfied, and in reliance on the concern having the benefit of the skill and experience which they understood these gentlemen to possess, then no doubt in my opinion the petitioners, on discovering that these representations were false, would be entitled to have their contract to take shares set aside. But then, although the prospectus of the first company did contain a representation that Mr Esslemont was to be a director, and it is not clear that that representation was well founded in point of fact, I do not think that this will assist the petitioners much, for I do not think that they are entitled to inquire into the truth or falsehood of that representation in the prospectus of the first company, because that first company has been wound up, and one constituted on a different basis put in its place. I agree with Lord M'Laren in thinking that Mr Esslemont was entitled to withdraw from the company for any reason which he thought good, because he had not bound himself by any final agreement to take shares in the company. At the same time I think it quite fair to observe that I cannot see anything of the nature of fraud or improper motive in issuing a prospectus which contained Mr Esslemont's name as chairman of the company. I think that the promoters had sufficient ground for believing that they had Mr Esslemont's authority for what they did. That company, however, is, as I have said, wound up, and a new one put in its place, and the only question which we have to consider is whether the prospectus of this second company contains any representation, whether fraudulent or not, in regard to material facts, which on investigation has now turned out to be false.

The representation in the circular which is founded on as being both false in fact and material is to this effect. It is stated that owing to an error in the memorandum of association to the effect that the registered office of the company would be in England instead of in Scotland, it had been found necessary to register the company in Scotland and to manage the business in Glasgow; that the company had accordingly been registered in Scotland, and then the circular proceeds in these terms, "As the company will now fall to be managed in Glasgow, Messrs Esslemont and Clark, the two members of Parliament (whose parliamentary duties will prevent their attendance at the board), and Mr M'Cankie have retired." Now, I agree with your Lordships that Mr Esslemont was not bound to give any reasons to the promoters for withdrawing, and if he did give his reasons to the promoters, I am of opinion that they were under no obligation to publish these reasons. But then it is said that those who framed the circular are not content with a mere statement that Mr Esslemont had retired, for they go on to give a reason for his action, which was not only false in fact as not being Mr Esslemont's true reason, but was also misleading, inasmuch as the statement of it was calculated to induce people to think that Mr Esslemont had no other reason. Now, I entirely agree with Lord M'Laren that the statement about Mr Esslemont's parliamentary duties amounts to nothing more than one of those conventional excuses with which we are familiar. I think it is impossible that it should bear the construction which the petitioners put upon it. What they say is this:—"The prospectus and circular referred to were fraudulently conceived and issued in the terms above mentioned, expressly for the purpose of misleading and deceiving applicants for shares, by inducing them to believe that Mr Esslemont had faith in the company, and was willing to lend his name to it, and put money into it, and as matter of fact the petitioners were so misled and deceived, and in consequence applied for shares." It appears to me out of the question to say that the statement in the circular would convey any such meaning to any intelligent reader. The only fact which it states is that Esslemont and the other directors had retired, and it therefore warned the public that they were not to be directors. It also gives a reason for their withdrawal, but to infer from the statement of that reason the conclusion that Mr Esslemont continued to have confidence in the company appears to be wholly unreasonable. I therefore agree with your Lordships in thinking that the petitioners have failed to shew any reason for having their names removed from the register.

No. 201.
July 3, 1891.
Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited.

LORD ADAM was absent at the hearing.

THE COURT refused the petition.

SOMERVILLE & WATSON, S.S.C.—CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 202.
July 3, 1891.
Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

GEORGE BURRELL AND OTHERS (Owners of the "Strathspey"), Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Ure—Younger.
DAVID MACBRAYNE (Owner of the "Islay"), Defender (Respondent).—Asher—Salvesen.
Et e contra.

Ship—Collision—Pilot—Compulsory pilotage district—Master—Responsibility for leaving dock—Employment of tug—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), sec. 388.—The "Strathspey," a steamship of 992 tons, shortly after leaving the port of Glasgow, and when in charge of a pilot, and within the compulsory pilotage district of the River Clyde, in going down the river, came into collision with, and injured another vessel, the "Islay." The accident was due to the violence of the wind and the "Strathspey's" want of steerage-way, arising from an unusually strong ebb tide, and the slow rate at which the vessel was moving in order to comply with the river bye-laws, which forbade more than a certain rate of speed.

In an action of damages at the instance of the owner of the "Islay" against the owners of the "Strathspey" the pursuer pleaded that the master of the "Strathspey" was answerable either by himself or in conjunction with the pilot for allowing his ship to leave the dock, and for neglecting to employ a stern tug to assist in steering her, and that the weather and tide conditions were such as to amount to a case of manifest danger, for the disregard of which the presence of the pilot did not relieve him from liability.

Held that as the pilot was in charge before the vessel left the dock,* it was for him to decide whether she could prudently leave her moorings, and whether a tug was required, and that the pursuer, on whom the onus lay, had failed to prove contributory negligence on the part of the master; and further, that the

* The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 388, provides,—"No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship, within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law."

No. 202.

July 3, 1891.

Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

1ST DIVISION, Lord Low. C.

local conditions of wind and tide on the day in question did not present a case of manifest danger such as to have made it the duty of the master to have taken his ship out of the hands of the pilot.

ABOUT half-past five o'clock, on the evening of the 25th of January 1890, the s.s. "Strathspey," of 992 tons register, left the Queen's Dock, Glasgow, and proceeded down the River Clyde. When she arrived at a point a little above Pointhouse Wharf she came into collision with the steamer "Islay," which was proceeding up the river. Both vessels were injured by the collision. An action of damages was brought by the owners of the "Strathspey" against the owner of the "Islay," and subsequently a cross action of damages was brought by the owner of the "Islay" against the owners of the "Strathspey," and the actions were conjoined.

In the action at the instance of the owner of the "Islay," it was averred;—(Cond. 3) "The said collision was due entirely to the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible. Looking to the state of the weather, and the very heavy current which was running down the river, it was grossly imprudent for the 'Strathspey' to have left the Queen's Dock and proceeded on her voyage on the night in question. At all events she should not have attempted to do so without the assistance of one or more tugs to help to steer her in the narrower parts of the channel. The defenders or their captain were grossly negligent in failing to provide such a tug or tugs. Owing to the state of the tide, the 'Strathspey,' as she was unprovided with a tug or tugs to assist in steering her, required to proceed at an unsafe and improper rate of speed in the part of the river where the collision took place, in order that she might have steerage-way. She could not in consequence be navigated in a safe and seamanlike manner. The result was, that instead of keeping clear of the 'Islay,' as she ought to have done, she ran into her port sponson."

The owners of the "Strathspey" answered;—"By article 1 of the bye-laws and regulations enacted by the Trustees of the Clyde Navigation, in virtue of the Act 21 and 22 Vict. cap. 149, it is provided that 'Every vessel, of whatever description, exceeding sixty tons register, navigating the River Clyde, shall, unless the master or person in charge holds a certificate under the Merchant Shipping Act, have a pilot on board duly licensed by the Statutory Board for licensing pilots, who shall be placed on an elevated station so as to be able to see distinctly in due time any vessel or obstruction ahead.' At the time of the collision she was in charge of a licensed pilot, James Patience, whose orders were all obeyed by the crew of the ship. If any fault was committed in the navigation of the 'Strathspey' it was the fault of the pilot. The defenders refer to section 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854."

They pleaded;—(2) Separatim, The collision having been occasioned by the fault of a licensed pilot acting in charge of the "Strathspey," within a district where pilotage was compulsory by law, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof.

The circumstances under which the collision took place were thus described by his Lordship:—

"It was the duty of the 'Strathspey,' which was going down the river, to keep to the north side; and of the 'Islay,' which was coming up the river, to keep to the south side. It is therefore admitted that if the collision took place on the south side of the river the 'Strathspey' must have been in fault, and if upon the north side of the river the 'Islay' must have been in fault.

No. 202.

July 3, 1891.
Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

"In my opinion it is established that the collision took place on the south side of the river. . . .

"Further, I am of opinion that the balance of the other evidence in the case is in favour of the view that the collision was caused by the 'Strathspey' sheering across to the south side, and certainly the probabilities of the case point to the accident having happened in that way.

"At the time when the 'Strathspey' left the Queen's Dock an unusually strong current was running down the river, and a gale, almost a hurricane, was blowing across the river from south to north. In such circumstances, the skilled evidence establishes that it is difficult to keep a vessel coming down with the stream under complete control, without going at a rate of speed dangerous at that part of the river.* If the vessel is not kept at such a speed as to give the helm complete command over her, she is necessarily, to a greater or less degree, at the mercy of the current, and may easily, in a narrow waterway such as the Clyde is at the place where the collision occurred, be carried or sheer to the one side or the other before those on board can stop her or alter her course.

"Those who were on board the 'Strathspey' agree in saying that she did not go fast down the river. The engineer, Robert Brown, deponed that the engines were kept at slow, and occasionally stopped altogether for a short time. If this was the case, I do not think that she could possibly have been at all times completely under control of her helm, and if she was not it is not difficult to see how the collision came about. A ship in coming out of the Queen's Dock has her bow pointed somewhat across the river towards the south bank. It is therefore necessary in order to get her into her course down the northern side of the river to put the helm aport. Further, if the tide is running down, it catches the port bow when the ship comes out of the dock, and that also has a tendency to send her to the north. When the 'Strathspey' came out of the dock those in charge of her say that the helm was ported, and that she went over to and down the north side of the channel. There are two buoys between the entrance of the Queen's Dock and Pointhouse Wharf, and Patience, the pilot of the 'Strathspey,' says that she passed within 10 feet of the first buoy, and grazed the second buoy. Accepting this statement as accurate, it is evident that the 'Strathspey' was then on a course which, if continued, would have taken her right into Pointhouse Wharf. Therefore the helm must have been starboarded, which would have the effect of bringing the bow of the ship towards the south, and laying her to some extent across the current. If the ship was not under complete control, it is easy to see how, in these circumstances, she might get across to the south side of the river before she could be brought round again upon a port helm. After careful consideration of the whole evidence, this seems to be what actually happened, the result being that the 'Strathspey' ran into the 'Islay,' which was on her own side of the river.

"In regard to the 'Islay,' she was proceeding up the river upon the south side of the Channel. Her progress had been somewhat retarded by the 'Hallegarde,' which was being towed up in front of her, and she had stopped her engines altogether for a short time when opposite Pointhouse

* It appeared from the proof that there was a bye-law of the Clyde Trustees regulating the rate of speed at that part of the river to four miles an hour, that "tramp" boats of the class of the "Strathspey" require to go through the water at three or four knots before they feel the helm, and that the current on the day in question was at least a three knot current.

No. 202.

July 8, 1891.

Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

Wharf, but before the 'Strathspey' came down she had again steamed ahead. When the master of the 'Islay' saw that the 'Strathspey' was crossing the river he backed the engines in order, if possible, to get out of her way. To do so seems to have been the only chance which he had of avoiding a collision, and I am of opinion that no blame whatever attaches to those in charge of the 'Islay.'"

It appeared from the evidence that it was high-water at Glasgow at 4.41 that afternoon, that the "Strathspey" started at 5.20, that the ebb tide was unusually strong, and that there was a heavy spate in the river. Patience, the "Strathspey's" pilot, deponed,—"The captain was on the bridge beside me. He obeyed all my orders instantly. The third mate was at the helm. He obeyed my orders. In fact all the crew obeyed the orders I gave."

The evidence as to the practice regarding the employment of a tug to assist vessels down the river was contradictory, but it was not proved that it was at all usual in vessels of the size of the "Strathspey,"* although some witnesses stated that it would have been prudent for the "Strathspey" to have had one on the occasion in question. The evidence was also contradictory as to whether it was for the pilot or for the master to say that a tug should be taken.†

The further evidence in the case sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of Lord Kinnear.

The Lord Ordinary (Low), on 19th February 1891, pronounced the following interlocutor in the conjoined actions:—"Finds that the collision between the steamers 'Strathspey' and 'Islay,' referred to on record, which took place on 25th January 1890, was caused by the fault of those on board and in charge of the 'Strathspey,' and for whom the owners thereof are responsible, and was not caused by the fault of those on board and in

---

* James Patience, the "Strathspey's" pilot, deponed,—"I had no talk with the captain about taking a tug. With ships of the size of the 'Strathspey' I never take a tug, unless there is some defect about the engines. If a ship is very long and light she needs a tug to help her to steer and to turn the bends of the river. The 'Strathspey' is about 240 feet long. I don't call her a long ship. She can take the bends of the river without any assistance. I never had any difficulty in steering her."

Robert Buchan, a pilot, deponed,—"By the Court.—It was simply because it was such a very wild night that I think the 'Strathspey' ought to have had a tug on that occasion. In ordinary circumstances with steamers of that size it is not the practice to have a stern tug, although it has been done. By counsel for David Macbrayne.—I don't think it is even common to have stern tugs for steamers of that size and class in ordinary circumstances. It has been done; but vessels below 1000 tons don't usually have a tug in common circumstances."

Daniel Dunn, master of the "Strathspey," deponed,—"I have been in the 'Strathspey' for six years as second mate, mate, and then master. I have held a master's certificate for about four years. I have sailed down the Clyde from Glasgow in the steamer fourteen or fifteen times, and up the Clyde about as often. I have come up the Clyde in other vessels besides her. The 'Strathspey' steers very well. I never had a tug to assist in navigating her either coming up or going down the river, except on one occasion when the main engines were not working. There was no need of a tug so far as I can see. The ship took the bends in the river quite easily without the assistance of a tug."

† William Cook, the manager for the owners of the "Strathspey," deponed in cross,—"We leave it entirely to the pilot to decide whether or not he will have a stern tug in taking a vessel down the river. If he wants a tug he comes up and tells us, and we order it."

No. 202.

July 8, 1891.

Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

charge of the 'Islay'; therefore in the action at the instance of Burrell and others, the owners of the 'Strathspey,' against Macbrayne, the owner of the 'Islay,' assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: And in the action at the instance of Macbrayne against Burrell and others, finds that the defenders are liable in damages to the pursuer, and appoints the cause to be enrolled that parties may be heard on the sum for which they are liable, in accordance with these findings: Reserves all questions of expenses, and grants leave to reclaim."*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . . It is necessary now to consider an alternative defence stated by the owners of the 'Strathspey,' viz., that, assuming that the collision was occasioned by fault in the navigation of that vessel, the owners are freed from liability under the 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, in respect that the vessel was in charge of a licensed pilot, and within a part of the river where pilotage is compulsory.

"To this alternative defence the owners of the 'Islay' reply that the fault which truly occasioned the collision lay in leaving the Queen's Dock in circumstances which rendered it dangerous to do so, and that that was a matter for which the master, and not the pilot only, was responsible.

"The question thus raised is one both of novelty and difficulty, but I shall state what I conceive to be the law applicable to such a case, and consider how it falls to be applied to the facts disclosed in evidence.

"The following propositions in law appeared to me to be settled:—(1) Where, in a collision, a vessel is proved to be in fault, the master and owners are prima facie liable, and in order that they may take the benefit of the 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act they must prove that the fault was that of the pilot, and of the pilot alone. If both the pilot and the master were in fault the owners are responsible. (2) The pilot, while the ship is under his charge, supersedes the master in all matters connected with the navigation of the ship, and (assuming that the collision was not due to defect in the ship or her apparel) it is sufficient to throw the fault upon the pilot to prove that the master and crew obeyed and properly carried out his orders; but (3) the fact that a pilot is in charge will not free the master from responsibility if he allows the ship to run into an apparent and obvious danger; for example, if he allows the anchor to be weighed and the ship to proceed in a thick fog.

"These propositions are, I think, all established by the cases of the 'Peerless,' 13 Moore's P. C. Cases, 484, and the 'Julia,' Lushington's Reports, 224.

"In the present case I think that it is clear that the pilot alone was responsible for all that occurred after the 'Strathspey' left her moorings in the Queen's Dock, because the ship was then under his charge, and it is not disputed that the master and crew carried out the orders which he gave. But the question is, whether the default which led to the accident did not consist in going out of the dock under the existing conditions of wind and tide, or, at all events, in going out without a stern tug to control the course of the vessel. Now, as I have already said, the ship left the dock at half-past five on a January night, when, although there was no fog, it was of course dark. The tide had then turned, and as there had been an abnormally high tide and a heavy land-flood the seaward stream was unusually rapid and powerful. Further, a gale of great violence was blowing. It was under these conditions that the 'Strathspey,' a vessel of 992 tons register, and a full-bottomed cargo boat, built upon lines not adapted to expeditious handling (although for her class she appears to have steered well), was taken out of dock to navigate seaward a narrow and frequented channel. The alternative dangers to which such a proceeding exposed her were that she must either steam at a dangerous speed in order to keep steerage way, or run the risk of becoming unmanageable. In the view which I take of the evidence, it was the latter danger in which she became involved, and which resulted in the collision. The pilot steamed slowly, as by the bye-laws of the Clyde Trustees he was bound to do in that part of the river, and the result was that the force of the elements rendered the ship unmanageable.

And on 18th March following his Lordship decerned against the owners of the "Strathspey" for £550 of damages, and found them liable in the whole expenses of the conjoined actions.

No. 202.

July 3, 1891.

Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

Short of going at greater speed—which under the bye-laws he was not entitled to do—I do not find any evidence that the pilot when once in the stream could by more skilful navigation have averted the catastrophe. The cardinal mistake was, in my opinion, venturing into the river at the time when the ship left the dock. She could have left in safety an hour or two earlier, because the tide would have been against her, and she would have had the advantage of daylight. Probably she might also have started in safety later in the evening when the downward rush of the tide had lost its force. But to start at the time she did, when the ebb tide was running its strongest, and the wind and the darkness increased the peril, was, in my judgment, according to the preponderance of evidence and as the event proved, rash in the extreme.

"The question is, was the pilot alone responsible for allowing the 'Strathspey' to start when she did, or was the master also responsible? I think that the answer to that question depends upon whether the danger was one of such a purely local nature that the master could not reasonably be expected to know of or appreciate it, or whether it was so patent that any master with a competent knowledge of his profession could see it for himself. If the danger was of the latter character, I do not think that it can be said that no duty or responsibility rested upon the master. No doubt, when the ship is once under way, the pilot has, unless in very exceptional cases, the sole and supreme command. But I cannot but think that it is for the master to decide whether the ship is to be got under way or not. If he is doubtful he may properly enough avail himself of the local knowledge and experience of the pilot, and if, in a land-locked channel like the Clyde, the pilot assured him that there was no danger to be apprehended, probably the duty of the master will be discharged. In the present case the master did not consult the pilot. Both he and the pilot assumed—erroneously, as it turns out—that there was no danger; or, being anxious to start, ignored the danger. Was then the danger one which the master might reasonably be expected to have foreseen? I think that it was. According to the evidence it seems to me that the danger was obvious enough, and must have been apparent to any seaman who took the trouble to consider the matter. The master must have known that the tide had been extraordinarily high, that the heavy rains had added to the flood, and that a strong stream when the tide turned would be the result, and he saw that it was blowing hard and that the night was dark. Further, he had been fourteen or fifteen times down the Clyde, and as many times up again, and could not plead that he was in a locality wholly unknown to him. In these circumstances it was, in my opinion, contrary to his duty to leave the dock at the time he did,—and to say that he did not know of the state of matters in the river is, in my judgment, no excuse, because he ought to have ascertained them. No doubt the pilot ought to have warned him of his danger; but, in my opinion, the circumstances were such that the master ought himself to have seen and considered the risk.

"There was a great deal of evidence led as to the use of a tug astern a vessel going down with the tide. Many of the most experienced witnesses say that on such a night a tug would have been of little use. I am inclined, however, to think that if a stern tug had been employed, no blame could have been justly attributed to the master in allowing the ship to start. As, however, a tug was not employed, the matter does not seem to be important. Whether the fault lay in starting at all, or in starting without a tug, I think that the master was equally responsible.

"I am therefore of opinion that the plea rested upon the 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act cannot be sustained.

"The result is that I assoilzie the owners of the 'Islay' in the action at the instance of the owners of the 'Strathspey,' and find them entitled to damages in the action at their instance."

No. 202.

July 3, 1891.
Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

The owners of the "Strathspey" reclaimed against both interlocutors, but at the hearing they stated that they did not propose to dispute the Lord Ordinary's finding that their vessel was to blame; the fault, however, was that of the pilot and not to any extent that of the master.

Argued for them;—The Lord Ordinary had accurately stated the facts as to the conditions of wind, weather, and tide at the time of the collision, and as to the primary cause of the accident being due to the vessel having ever left the dock. But he had wrongly attributed the fault of her leaving to the master. It was the duty of the pilot to consider whether the ship could safely be taken to sea. In the case of the navigation of a river like the Clyde, the knowledge and services of a pilot were much more necessary than they would have been if the vessel had been setting out to sea from an open roadstead. The conditions of tide and weather, which made it unsafe to venture down the river on the afternoon in question, were just those which ought to have been known to and appreciated by the pilot, and to which the provision of the Merchant Shipping Act regarding compulsory pilotage applied.[1] It was not disputed that every one on board the "Strathspey" was at his post. Everything therefore was in favour of the ship, and although the onus was upon the owners to shew that the fault was not theirs, they had discharged it. But it was further said that there was negligence on the part of the owners, or of the master as representing them, in starting without a tug. But there was no evidence to support this. It was, no doubt, the case that with the larger class of vessels a tug was sometimes taken. But this was not universal, and the "Strathspey" was not a vessel of such a size as to require a tug. Besides it was for the pilot to judge whether a tug was necessary or not;[2] as long as the pilot was in command he was responsible. Further, it was not material to the accident here that a tug was not taken. There was further no obvious and known danger here for taking the vessel into which the master would be held responsible.[3] The case of the "Borussia"[4] was explained in the report of the case of the "Maria";[5] she was not in compulsory pilotage waters when the accident to her took place; but assuming that she was, the Court held in the "Borussia" case that it was manifestly dangerous to have moved her from the dock at the time, and that the owners were therefore liable.

Argued for the respondent;—The "Strathspey" ought not to have left the docks at all, or if she did leave, she ought to have had a stern tug. (1) There was a duty on the master to consider whether she ought to have left port at all. The act of starting was a different thing from the act of navigation, which was the province of the pilot. It was only when the navigation commenced that the pilot's duties also began. If the master had authorised or asked the pilot to take the responsibility of deciding this question it would have been different. Where, as here, the question of the admissibility of starting was not discussed between them, the fault presumably was with the master.[6] At anyrate, there was a very heavy onus upon the master to prove that the fault was not his, and was

[1] The "Christiana," 1850, 7 Moore's P. C. Reps. 160; the "Lochlibo," 1850, 3 William Robinson's Admir. Reps. 310, and 1851, 7 Moore's P. C. Reps. 427; the "City of Cambridge," 1874, L. R., 5 P. C. App. 451; the "Oakfield," 1886, L. R., 11 Prob. Div. 34.

[2] The "Peerless," 1860, 13 Moore's P. C. Rep. 484; the "Lochlibo," 1850, 3 William Robinson's Admir. Reps. 310.

[3] The "Oakfield," 1886, L. R., 11 Prob. Div. 34.

[4] 1 Swabey's Reps. 94.

[5] The "Maria," 1867, 1 Adm. and Eccles. Reps. 358.

[6] The "Schwalbe," 1860, 14 Moore's P. C. Reps. 241.

No. 202.

July 3, 1891.
Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

due to the pilot; and he must further shew that it was the exclusive fault of the pilot. If the master had not been entirely to blame here, he was at least guilty of contributory negligence. The state of the weather on the evening in question was such as the ordinary sailor was able to judge of, without any special or local knowledge such as required the experience or called for the intervention of the pilot.[1] (2) The question of the employment of a tug fell within the duties of the master. The pilot had no authority to engage one.[2] (3) The case was one where the master ran into a manifest and obvious danger, and on that ground alone the master was responsible.[3]

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The question that we have to consider is, whether the owners of the s.s. "Islay," or the owners of the s.s. "Strathspey," or either of them, are responsible for the consequences of the collision which took place between these two vessels in the Clyde on the evening of 25th January 1890? The Lord Ordinary has given us in his opinion a very clear account of the material facts. It is not disputed that his Lordship's opinion is perfectly sound so far as he finds that no fault is to be attributed to the "Islay"; and, on the other hand, it is not very seriously disputed that he is also right in saying that the collision is to be ascribed to the fault of some person or persons in charge of the "Strathspey." Nor do I think it is very seriously disputed that his Lordship is right in the opinion which he has expressed both as to the proximate cause of the accident and as to the particular fault—if there be any fault—which he holds to be proved against the "Strathspey."

The "Strathspey" was lying at the east end of the Queen's Dock in Glasgow. The Lord Ordinary says that at the time she started to go down the river the tide had just turned, "and as there had been a heavy land-flood, and an abnormally high tide, the seaward stream was unusually rapid and powerful. Further, a gale of great violence was blowing." In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary points out that the alternative dangers to which a ship going down the river was exposed, in navigating seawards so narrow and so frequented a channel as the Clyde, were that she must either steam at a dangerous speed in order to keep steerage-way or run the risk of becoming unmanageable. The risks to which she would be exposed, if she steamed at a dangerous speed, are obvious enough; on the other hand, if she was not going through the water at a considerably more rapid rate than the water itself was moving, it was impossible to gain steerage-way so as to bring the ship fully under the command of the helm. Now, the Lord Ordinary thinks it was the latter of these two dangers in which the ship became involved. When the collision became imminent, or at all events when the risk of the two ships coming into collision became obvious to those on board the "Strathspey," it is not, I think, suggested that any wrong or improper order was given by the persons in charge, but the ship was going at such a speed that she had not, for the reasons which the Lord Ordinary has pointed out, and to which I have adverted, complete steerage-way. She therefore became

[1] The "Borussia," 1856, 1 Swabey's Reps. 94; the "Girolamo," 1834, 3 Haggard's Adm. Reps. 176; the "Julia," 1861, 1 Lushington's P. C. Reps. 224; the "Oakfield," 1886, L. R., 11 Prob. Div. 34; the "Belgic," 1875, L. R., 2 Prob. Div. 57; the "Ocean Wave," 1870, L. R., 3 P. C. Apps. 205; Marsden on Collisions at Sea, 246.

[2] The "Borussia," 1856, 1 Swabey's Adm. Reps. 94.

[3] The "Girolamo," 1834, 3 Haggard's Adm. Reps. 176.

No. 202.

July 3, 1891.
Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

unmanageable and helpless, and when the proper order was given for bringing her to the north side of the river, which was her own proper side, she did not answer the helm, but was carried or sheered towards the south, and came into collision with the "Islay."

Now, I quite concur with the Lord Ordinary that this is the result of the evidence as to the cause of the accident; and that being so, the first question which it appears to me to raise is, whether there was any fault on the part of those in command of the "Strathspey" in steaming at so slow a rate of speed as they had actually adopted—a rate which they ought to have known must expose the ship to the danger of becoming unmanageable in consequence of the rapidity of the current at the time. The Lord Ordinary says this was not a fault, because the regulations and bye-laws of the Clyde made it necessary to steam slowly at that particular part of the river, and because the officer in charge therefore could not have gone faster without infringing those bye-laws. I am not satisfied that it is proved that the officer in command could not have gone at greater speed without infringing the bye-law; nor am I satisfied that it is proved that he could not have done so, that night, without running into some other hazard such as that which he encountered by doing as he did. But I do not think it is material to consider whether that is proved or not, because I think the Lord Ordinary is quite right in saying that the "Strathspey" was at that moment exposed to alternative hazards; and even if it were proved that the officer in command, in choosing between two risks, had taken one which led to disaster, while if he had chosen to encounter the other he might have taken the ship down the river in safety, I do not think that that would amount to fault on the part of the officer in charge for which he or his owners could be made responsible, because if he came into a position without any fault of his own in which he had to exercise his judgment between two alternative hazardous courses, and did exercise his judgment and take the course which he thought best, I do not think it would be possible for the Court to say he was blameable for the choice he had made. I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that we must go further back to find fault—if there was any fault—on the part of those in charge of the "Strathspey." His Lordship says that the fault consisted in leaving the dock at all, at the particular time and under the particular circumstances under which the "Strathspey" started, and I further agree with his Lordship in that opinion. I think the evidence shews that to leave the dock and proceed down the river at the time when the "Strathspey" started, when the ebb tide was at its strongest and the wind and darkness increased the peril, was, according to the evidence, a very imprudent course to take. Now, if that be so, I think that is a fault for which the owners of the "Strathspey" would be responsible if the ship at the time was under the command of the master for whom they are answerable, and if the fault was committed by the master.

But then the defenders say they are free from liability in consequence of the provisions of the 388th section of the Mercantile Shipping Act, because their vessel was under the charge of a licensed pilot, and in a part of the river where pilotage was compulsory. The question therefore comes to be, whether the pilot or master of the vessel is responsible for taking her down at the particular time, and in the circumstances in which she left the dock. Now, there is no question as to the obligation of owners of ships of this class to have a duly licensed pilot on board. A pilot had accordingly been engaged to take the "Strathspey" down the river, and he came on board while she was still in dock. I think the duty of the master when his ship was ready to start was to put her in charge of the pilot, and thereafter to obey the pilot's orders, and see that they were obeyed by his crew. I think that was his sole duty. The evidence of the pilot is conclusive to the effect that this duty was fully performed. The pilot took charge of the vessel before she proceeded from the dock, and from the moment that he took charge the conduct of the navigation belonged exclusively to him. He was therefore responsible for carrying her through the dock, out of the dock into the river, and down the river seawards so long as she remained within the limits of the water where pilotage is compulsory. I think it follows that it was for the pilot and not for the master to determine the particular time at which it would be prudent to leave the dock and enter the river. I cannot assent to the proposition which was urged upon us very forcibly by the respondents' counsel that it was the master who was responsible for getting the ship under weigh, and that the pilot was responsible only for her navigation after she had begun to move through the water. There can be no divided authority in the ship on a question so vital to her safety; and it appears to me that the pilot, who is responsible for taking the ship safely out of the dock and down the river, must be the sole authority to decide whether she can prudently leave her moorings and enter the river at any particular condition of wind and tide. It is said that the owners are responsible because the fault consisted not merely in starting in circumstances which made it dangerous to leave the dock, but in starting in those circumstances without any tug astern. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that it is not proved that a tug would have been of service, in the particular circumstances of this case. But however that may be, it is clear upon the evidence that although it may be useful or necessary to employ a tug for vessels of a certain length, which cannot readily take the bends of the river without such assistance, it is not necessary nor customary that a tug should be employed for a ship such as the "Strathspey." If the abnormal condition of the river made it prudent or necessary to take unusual precautions, it was for the pilot to point out the necessity. It was for him to say either that he could not start at all while the river was running so strongly, or that he could not start without additional help if he thought additional help was required. Therefore if I am right in thinking it was for the pilot to decide whether he could safely go down the river at all, it seems to me to follow that it was for him to say whether he could start with the ship in her ordinary condition, or whether he required to have more than usual assistance—because of the exceptional state of the river. It is not suggested that he asked for any such assistance, or that he had any doubt as to his ability to take the ship down the river safely without it; and indeed it is clear from his own evidence that he had no such doubt, because he says that the difficult part of the task was in taking the vessel from the dock, which was crowded with shipping, and that when he got clear of the dock he thought all his difficulties were at an end.

No. 202.

July 3, 1891.

Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

Agreeing therefore with the Lord Ordinary as to the blame which is imputed to the "Strathspey," I am of opinion that the fault lay with the pilot. He was bound to know the state of the tide and the state of the current, and the rate at which he could steam, and to consider whether steaming at such a rate and in such circumstances it would be possible to keep steerage-way upon the ship—to know the risks to which he was exposed in going down the narrow channel of the Clyde at that place. It was for him alone, considering all these matters, to decide whether it was safe to leave the dock; and if he was blameable for so deciding I think the blame lies with him and not with the master.

No. 202.

July 8, 1891.
Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

But then it was maintained that in order to give the owners the benefit of the 388th section of the statute it is necessary for them to prove that not only was the pilot in fault but that he was solely in fault, and therefore that they must prove that there was no fault at all on the part of the master. And it was said that they had failed to discharge that burden, because they had not proved that it was in fact the pilot and not the master who had given the order to get under weigh. It is not enough, according to the argument, to say that a pilot was in charge; it must further be shewn that the master did not interfere with his authority and give orders to start either without consulting him at all, or in disregard of his opinion, if he was consulted. Now, there is undoubtedly some authority in support of the argument which was so maintained to us; and in particular there is the authority of the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the "Iona," which was delivered by Sir Richard Kindersley, in which that learned Judge says this—"It is not enough for the owners to prove that there was fault or negligence in the pilot. They must prove to the satisfaction of the Court which has to try the question that there was no default whatever on the part of the officers and crew of their vessel, or any of them, which might have been in any degree conducive to the damage." But the question whether the doctrine of law so stated ought to be followed was considered, and decided in the negative by this Court in the case of the Clyde Navigation Trustees against Barclay, Curle, & Company, and the decision of the Court was upheld by the House of Lords on appeal, 3 R. (H. L.) 44, and as the question is one of very general importance, and was argued to us upon the footing that the law is either unsettled or that it must have been held to have been fixed in accordance with the opinion which I have just read, it seems to me to be very important to call attention to what was said by the learned Lords who advised the House in the case of the Clyde Navigation Trustees. Lord Chelmsford quoted the passage I have mentioned in the judgment of the Privy Council, and said that this doctrine imposed "upon the owners a species of negative proof which it is impossible for them to give." Lord Selborne said that he did not consider that the expressions used in previous cases were intended to lay down any arbitrary rule inverting the general principles of onus probandi as applied to this particular class of cases; and then he proceeded to lay down what in his judgment is the true position of a shipowner pleading the exception established by statute. And his Lordship says this:—"There are three things necessary to be proved—first, that a qualified pilot was acting in charge of the ship; secondly, that that was compulsory; and thirdly, that it was his fault or incapacity which occasioned the loss or damage. I apprehend that if a defender proves all these three positions and proves nothing more, then the burden is upon the pursuer, to lay some foundation, at all events, for alleging that, notwithstanding the proof given that there was a qualified pilot in charge and that compulsory, and that he committed some fault or shewed some incapacity by which loss or damage was occasioned, yet there was also contributing to the loss or damage other causes for which the owners of the ship were responsible. Some foundation for such a case of contributory negligence must be laid, and I apprehend it is clear on general principle that the burden of laying that foundation rests upon the pursuer. And then his Lordship goes on to say, quoting what had been said by Lord Moncreiff in the Court below, that "the true principle is that it is not enough for the owners to shew that the damage arose through the fault of the pilot, if there is reasonable ground for saying that there was contributory fault on the part of the master or crew. The proof of circumstances which prima facie shew such reasonable ground for saying that there was contributory fault on the part of the master or crew no doubt would throw upon the defender the burden of explaining these circumstances so as to satisfy the Court that in point of fact the prima facie conclusion from these circumstances is not correct." The nature of the proof his Lordship goes on to consider. But upon that authority the only question which we have to consider upon this part of the case seems to be whether there is any reasonable ground for holding that the master contributed in any way to the fault which I hold to be proved against the officer in charge of the ship. It is said that we cannot hold that the pilot gave the order to get under weigh because it is not proved that the master did not give that order. I think if the relative duties of master and pilot are as I have described, it was for the pursuer who intends to allege that the fault was attributable to the master, to lay some foundation, at all events, for making that charge against him, and there is absolutely none to be found in the evidence.

No. 202.
July 3, 1891.
Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

But then there remains a different ground to which the Lord Ordinary has given effect. His Lordship holds that although the pilot was in charge of the ship, and although it may have been primarily his duty to consider and decide at what time the ship should get under weigh, the master also is responsible because he allowed the ship to run into an apparent and obvious danger. Now that appears to me to raise a much more difficult question, because now that we have the whole facts before us, it would certainly appear to have been very imprudent to start at that time. But it does not follow that there was any imprudence on the part of the master. The question is, whether the danger was so obvious that any seaman of competent skill ought to have foreseen it so clearly while his ship was still in dock as to make it his duty to take the ship out of the hands of the pilot, to take the responsibility upon himself, and to relieve the pilot of responsibility, by ordering him not to start. I do not think that in considering that question we ought to take into account the circumstance upon which the Lord Ordinary relies, that the master of this particular ship had been in the Clyde on various occasions before this occasion into which we are now inquiring. If the master had been in the Clyde before, I presume his ship was, on those previous occasions, as on this, in charge of a pilot; and therefore his presence on board the ship would not necessarily give him any local knowledge which ordinarily competent seamen in command of seagoing vessels would not obtain. But if the question depended to any extent upon local knowledge, then it seems to me to be clear that it is the local knowledge of the pilot, and not that which the captain may have accidentally obtained, which must prevail. Therefore I think the question depends upon whether this was an apparent and obvious danger which no competent master would allow his ship to encounter, irrespective of any local knowledge which the particular master might happen to have acquired. Now I am unable to agree with the view taken by the Lord Ordinary upon this question, because I think that all the circumstances which made it so hazardous for the ship to start upon her voyage were purely local conditions, of which the pilot was not only in law the proper judge, but of which he was by far a more competent judge than the master could be. There is no evidence that it was at all impossible for such a ship as the "Strathspey" to steam down the Clyde merely because the river was running at a particular pace, in consequence of the combination of the ebb tide and a land-flood. The "Strathspey" might have been able to go down the Clyde and go to sea with perfect safety, but what made her voyage dangerous was the particular rate of speed at which the river was running in relation to the rate at which it was necessary for the "Strathspey" to steam; and in considering whether that was a danger which the master was bound to estimate for himself to the exclusion of the judgment of the pilot, it appears to me that there are two considerations to which the Lord Ordinary has adverted which are very material. In the first place, his Lordship says that the cardinal mistake was in leaving the dock at the particular moment that the ship did leave. "She could have left in safety an hour or two earlier, because the tide would have been against her, and she would have had the advantage. Probably she might also have started in safety later in the evening when the downward rush of the tide had lost its force." Now it appears to me these are considerations the weight of which it was for the pilot to determine.

No. 202.

July 3, 1891.

Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

But then the other point to which his Lordship adverts is this, that the whole difficulty and danger arose from the impossibility of steaming at a greater speed than that actually adopted. Now, if it was in consequence of the bye-laws of the Clyde Trustees for the regulation of the navigation of the river that the pilot was compelled to adopt the rate of speed which he adopted, it appears to me that was eminently a consideration of which he was not only the proper judge, but the only competent judge. But if the bye-laws were not so rigorous as to involve any infringement or breach of rule on the part of the pilot, if he had chosen to steam at a somewhat more rapid pace than he actually chose, that again was a question of judgment for the pilot in command of the ship, and nobody else. The question therefore is, whether the master was not fairly entitled to believe that a pilot who undertook to take his ship safely down the river seawards was to be trusted with the decision of the question, whether either the bye-laws of the Clyde Trustees or any other consideration made it impossible for him to steam at the proper pace which was necessary in order to navigate the Clyde safely. That was the whole question the pilot had to consider. It appears to me it was a question for the pilot, and I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the conditions which the pilot ought to have known and taken into account in considering it, must necessarily have been so apparent and obvious to a shipmaster who had not the local experience of the pilot as to shew him his ship was being carried to destruction, and to compel him to take her out of the hands of the proper and responsible officer.

I am therefore on the whole of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right and ought to be adhered to in so far as he finds that the collision between the steamers was caused by the fault of those on board and in charge of the "Strathspey," and was not caused by the fault of those on board and in charge of the "Islay," and therefore that in the action at the instance of the owners of the "Strathspey" against the owners of the "Islay," the defender should be assoilzied. But I am unable to agree with the other conclusion at which his Lordship has arrived, and I think it ought to be altered so far as it finds that the owners of the "Strathspey" are responsible to the owners of the "Islay" by reason of the fault of the officers in charge being a fault for which they are answerable. I think the second plea in law for the defenders in the action at the instance of the owners of the "Islay" is well founded.

LORD M'LAREN and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred. No. 202.

The LORD PRESIDENT stated that LORD ADAM, who was not present at the advising, also concurred. July 3, 1891. Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutors of 19th February and 18th March 1891: In the action at the instance of the reclaimers against the owner of the "Islay" they assoilzied the defender; and in the action at the instance of the owner of the "Islay" against the owners of the "Strathspey" they sustained the second plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—WHIGHAM & COWAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES RUTHERFURD, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Comrie Thomson—Salvesen. No. 203.
M. MACGREGOR & COMPANY AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—Asher—Dickson. July 4, 1891. Rutherfurd v. MacGregor & Co.

Sale by auction—Bankrupt estate—Purchase by law-agents employed by trustee in sequestration—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 120.—The law-agents who had been employed by the trustee in a sequestration bought certain of the sequestrated effects which had been exposed by the trustee for sale by public roup. An unsuccessful bidder brought an action for reduction of the sale, and for declarator that he had become the purchaser of the subjects at the upset price, which was offered by him, on the ground that the law-agents had arranged with the trustee not to hold him personally liable for payment of their account, that there were no assets to which the agents had to look for payment save the subjects sold, and that the value of the subjects did not exceed the amount of their account. He pleaded that the sale was thus truly made for their behoof, and that they were not entitled to bid.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) held that the fact that the defenders had substantially the sole interest in the sale would at common law have disqualified them from bidding at the sale, but that as creditors they were entitled to do so under section 120 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. On a reclaiming note, held that at common law the agents were not disqualified from bidding by the interest they had in the sale, the subject sold being the property of the trustee, and the offer to purchase being made bona fide and not for the purpose of increasing the price.

Opinions (per Lord Young and Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that a law-agent employed by the trustee in a sequestration is not in respect of his account a creditor in the sequestration in the sense of the 120th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act of 1856.*

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. J.

ON 17th December 1890, Richard Brown, who had been appointed trustee on the sequestrated estate of James Young Guthrie, S.S.C., exposed for sale by public roup the book-debts, books, papers, accounts, and other effects belonging to the sequestrated estate. The only offerers at the sale were Messrs M. MacGregor & Company, W.S., who had been employed by the trustee as his law-agents in the sequestration, and James Rutherfurd, writer, Glasgow. The subjects were knocked down to MacGregor & Company at the price of £23.

On 2d February 1891 Rutherfurd brought an action against the trustee and MacGregor & Company for reduction of the sale, for declarator that the subjects had been purchased by the pursuer at the upset price of £5 sterling offered by him at the exposure for sale of the subjects, and

* The Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 120, enacts,—"When any estate is sold publicly by virtue of this Act, it shall be lawful for any creditor to purchase the same; but the trustee, or commissioner, or adjudger selling as aforesaid shall not be entitled to purchase."

No. 203. July 4, 1891. Rutherfurd v. MacGregor & Co.

further, for decree ordaining the trustee to execute and to deliver to him an assignation of the subjects.

The pursuer averred that MacGregor & Company had unpaid accounts against the trustee amounting to upwards of £200, for services rendered by them as law-agents on the trustee's employment. (Cond. 3) " . . . There were no assets available for the payment of those accounts but the price which might be obtained for said book-debts, books, accounts, papers and others exposed for sale as aforesaid. The trustee had an arrangement with his said agents that he should not be personally liable for their accounts, but should be liable only for the amount of assets in his hands belonging to the said sequestrated estate." (Cond. 4) "The said exposure for sale was thus truly made for behoof of the trustee's said law-agents. They were virtually the sellers. The price to be got was all to go to them towards payment of their account up to the full amount thereof. They received it accordingly. They received also the whole balance in the trustee's hands. Any increase of price up to the amount of their accounts was solely for their benefit. Their unpaid accounts exceeded £200, and it was all the same to them whether they offered at the sale the full amount of their accounts or any less sum. They could, without injury to themselves, have run up the bidding against a competitor to upwards of £200, and might then have dropped the sale into his hands at that figure. All the offers made on behalf of the said law-agents were illegal and invalid, and the sale to them was illegal and invalid. Their bidding was unfair to the pursuer. . . ."

MacGregor & Company lodged defences. They explained "that the balance in the trustee's hands was not sufficient to meet the expense of the sale and the trustee's discharge. Said balance was paid in terms of the instructions of the creditors in the minute of meeting of 19th January 1891." An extract of this minute was produced. The minute bore that the sale to the defenders was approved of, and that the trustee was instructed to grant the necessary conveyance and to hand over to the law-agents any balance remaining in his hands after paying the expenses of his discharge to account of the business charges due to them. The defenders admitted that they did not hold the trustee liable for their accounts beyond the amount of assets of the estate in his hands.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) All the offers made at the said sale, after the offer of the upset price made on behalf of the pursuer, being illegal and invalid, the pursuer is entitled to decree of reduction as concluded for. (2) The pursuer having made the only valid offer at the said sale, is entitled to the purchase, and to decree as concluded for, in terms of the declaratory and other conclusions, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support his pleas. (4) The offers made at the said sale by or on behalf of these defenders having been legal and valid, absolvitor should be pronounced.

On 22d May 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the reasons of reduction, and assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action.*

* " OPINION.—I have considered the argument in the case which I heard on Saturday last, and have referred to the authorities; but the conclusion to which I come is, that the question here is solved by the provision of the Bankrupt Act, which gives creditors a right to purchase at public sales of the bankrupt estate. I incline to accept the pursuer's view that the defenders here had, as law-agents in the sequestration, and as such entitled to payment of their accounts out of the first end of the estate, substantially the sole interest in the result of the sale, and that at common law that was a sufficient disqualification as against their bidding or purchasing. But, conceding this, I see no reason for reading the

No. 203.

July 4, 1891.
Rutherfurd v. MacGregor & Co.

The pursuer reclaimed, and during the discussion in the Inner-House amended his record by adding after the second sentence in cond. 4 the following averment:—"The value of the subjects exposed for sale was not more than the claim of the defenders on their said account."

Argued for the pursuer;—The Lord Ordinary's decision, as regarded the application to the case of the 120th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, was ill-founded. That section could only apply to persons who were creditors at the date of the sequestration. As regarded the common law, the Lord Ordinary's view was favourable to the pursuer. The defenders had given up their claim against the trustee personally, and they were trusting for payment of their account to the sale of the subjects, which formed the sole asset of the bankrupt estate. They were really the only persons interested in the result of the sale, and were virtually the sellers. They were therefore disqualified from bidding at the sale or purchasing.[1]

Argued for the defenders;—The Lord Ordinary's construction of the 120th section of the statute was sound. Although the defenders might not be able to rank as ordinary creditors, and had a claim against the trustee personally, they were not the less creditors entitled to purchase at public sales of bankrupt estate. Assuming, however, that the statute did not apply, they were entitled at common law to bid and purchase an asset of the bankrupt estate.[2] They were neither disqualified by their interest in the result of the sale nor by their arrangement with the trustee.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think there are any features of serious difficulty in this case.

Mr Comrie Thomson candidly admitted that, apart from the arrangement made by the defender with the trustee in the sequestration—to the effect that he would not insist on his claim against the trustee personally, but rely solely on the assets of the estate—he would not have a stateable case. In other words, he admitted that he could not maintain in the ordinary case that the agent in a sequestration might not bid for and purchase an asset of the sequestrated estate.

I am quite unable to see how the arrangement made by the defender can make any difference in the case of his making a bona fide bid for and buying an asset of the trust-estate. I see no distinction in the fact that he has given up what was his legal right, if the assets of the sequestrated estate should prove insufficient to meet his claim. I do not think that the present case is at all the statutory exemption in favour of creditors so narrowly as to exclude the agent in the sequestration, who, although he does not rank as an ordinary creditor, and has no doubt also a claim against the trustee personally, is yet, to all intents and purposes, a creditor in the sequestration, having a claim against the assets of the estate, which is none the worse because it is preferable.

---

"It may be that the result is to innovate on the common law rule applicable to sales by auction, but that is just what the statutory provision was designed to do. Nor is there any hardship to intending purchasers, because they knew, or are bound to know, that in sales of a sequestrated estate they were open to competition from creditors, including, it may be, sole creditors, who may often have the sole interest in the price."

[1] Faulds v. Corbet, &c., Feb. 25, 1859, 21 D. 587, 31 Scot. Jur. 313; Watson v. Maule, Jan. 19, 1743, M. 4892; Grey v. Stewart, July 7, 1753, M. 9560; More's Notes to Stair, lix.

[2] Noble v. Campbell, Nov. 4, 1876, 4 R. 77.

[3] Shiell v. Guthrie's Trustees, June 26, 1874, 1 R. 1083.

No. 203.

July 4, 1891.
Rutherfurd v. MacGregor & Co.

same as Faulds v. Corbet. I think it is more like Shiell v. Guthrie. But it is not necessary in my view to consider the distinction between these cases, because, if I am right in thinking that the arrangement made by the defender with the trustee makes no difference, I think the case of Noble v. Campbell is absolutely in point. The Lord President there points out that there is no such officer known to the law as the agent in a sequestration, and the person who acquires that title is simply the person employed by the trustee to do business for him in matters in which he is entitled to employ others to assist him. I think the case of Noble effectually disposes of this case, and I see no ground stated on record to suggest that the defender was not a bona fide purchaser of the asset in question. It is said that his account was larger than the value of the asset, but he, knowing that he had a claim against the estate, and that he was entitled to get payment in money, wanted to get the estate into his own hands, as he thought he could make something of it. I see no reason to think that the defender was acting with anything but an honest desire to get the asset knocked down to him at such a price that he could make something out of it.

With regard to the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has disposed of the case, I desire to add that I am not prepared to proceed upon that ground, though I am not prepared to say that it is wrong.

Lord Young.—I have come to the same conclusion. The case is interesting chiefly owing to the singularity of the circumstances, but when understood it is simple enough.

The bankrupt was a solicitor in Edinburgh, and in the result the whole estate left in the hands of the trustee consisted of the book-debts, books, accounts, and papers of the bankrupt. That was a speculative estate, and in the end all the creditors were satisfied that it would not yield more than would satisfy the trustee's claims, and that the trustee's claims for cost of management must be met before the claims of creditors. That being their view, the next fact to be noted is that the chief, if not the only party with whom the trustee had to deal, was the defender, who had, and there is no reason to doubt very properly, arranged that he would not hold the trustee personally liable for any claims he might have for services rendered, if the estate should not prove sufficient to meet these claims.

Such being the state of affairs, the estate in the hands of the trustee was exposed for sale, and, as was very proper, for sale by public roup, though I think, the creditors being willing, there would have been no objection at common law—there might be under the statute—to the estate being handed over by the trustee to the agent, and in my opinion there is nothing in the common law of Scotland to prevent the defender being a bidder at the sale. If he had bid beyond the amount of his account, the surplus after payment of his account would have gone to the creditors. If anyone had been prepared to give more than he was, there would have been no obstacle to such a purchaser acquiring the subjects. I see, therefore, no objection at common law to the defender's buying the subjects.

As at present advised, I could not assent to the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has put his judgment. I do not think the authority of the Bankruptcy Act is necessary to sanction the course taken by the defender, but if the sanction of the statute was necessary, I should not, as at present advised, be able to find such sanction in the statute, for I incline to the view that the defender was not a creditor in the sequestration in the sense of the Act. No. 203.

July 4, 1891.
Rutherfurd v. MacGregor & Co.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. The subject of the sale in this case was an asset of a sequestrated estate. I think that simple statement shews that this case does not fall within the rule of Faulds v. Corbet, because it is perfectly obvious from that statement that the subject of the sale was the property of the trustee in the sequestration, and not in any sense of the agent in the sequestration.

It is said that a difference arises in consequence of the arrangement made between the agent and the trustee, under which the liability of the trustee to the agent was limited to the value of the assets of the estate. I see no difference which that can make in regard to the matter of which I am now speaking. The trustee did not give the agent anything, and so the property of the estate necessarily remained in the trustee. The agent had nothing more than a personal claim against the trustee, that claim, however, being limited to the value of the assets of the sequestrated estate. The present case, therefore, is in no way similar to the case of Faulds v. Corbet, which proceeded on the ground that a seller may not himself buy the subject which he is selling.

It is further argued that the defender's interest in the value of the asset sold disqualified him from bidding at the sale. I have shewn that he was not disqualified in the sense of being owner of that asset either in title or fact, and if he was not owner, I can see no other disqualification which would prevent him from bidding at the sale. It was held in the case of Noble v. Campbell that the law-agent of the trustee in a sequestration might lawfully purchase an asset of the sequestrated estate, and I do not think that it makes any difference whether the agent is or is not a creditor of the trustee personally at the time of the purchase, or whether his contract with the trustee is of the usual kind, or his claim is limited as it was in this case.

I can understand that a very different case might arise if it were averred that the agent, having such an interest that the estate should realise a large value, had bid at the sale, not from a bona fide desire to purchase, but in order to increase the price. That might have been a very different case, but it is not averred. I assume, and I have no doubt that my assumption is in accordance with the fact, that the defender was a bona fide purchaser at the sale, desiring to make the purchase which he made, and I see nothing to prevent him becoming a purchaser.

I concur with Lord Young in what he said with regard to the Lord Ordinary's judgment. I am not satisfied that the defender is a creditor in the sequestration in the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, and though I do not express a definite opinion on the matter, I am not prepared to proceed on the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has decided the case.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—M. MACGREGOR & Co., W.S.—Agents.

DAVID MILNE CRABBE, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Balfour—Law. No. 204.
ROBERT WHYTE, Defender (Reclaimer).—Asher—Dickson.

July 7, 1891.
Crabbe v. Whyte.

Judicial factor—Curator bonis—Investment of ward's funds—Personal liability of curator bonis.—A curator bonis lent funds belonging to his ward on

No. 204.
July 7, 1891.
Crabbe v. Whyte.

the security of a tenement of houses and shops in a new street which was then in the course of formation in Dundee. When the loan was arranged the buildings were not nearly completed, but when the money was advanced the houses and shops were finished, and were for the most part let, but some workshops, of which the tenement also consisted, were unlet. The loan was made on a valuation by an architect of professional standing in Dundee, employed by the borrower. The valuation was made from plans, the buildings themselves not being examined. The security proved wholly inadequate to meet the loan.

In an action by the executor of the ward against the curator bonis held that the security was not such as a trustee ought to have accepted, and that the defender was personally bound to replace the sum lent.

1st Division. Ld. Kyllachy. C.

On 21st October 1890 David Milne Crabbe, executor of the late Mrs Isabella Milne or Allan, who had died in the Sunnyside Asylum, Montrose, on 15th April 1888, brought an action against Robert Whyte, solicitor, Forfar, who had been appointed curator bonis to Mrs Allan on 15th April 1875, concluding for payment of £3217, being a sum of £2700 belonging to the curatory estate, which the pursuer alleged had been invested on insufficient security through the negligence of the defender, together with arrears of interest on the said sum, and certain other alleged debts to the estate.

The defender pleaded;—(5) The defender having been guilty of no negligence in the matter alleged, et separatim, the pursuer having suffered no loss from the defender's actings, the latter should be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed. The following passage from the Lord Ordinary's opinion was admitted by the defender at the hearing in the Inner-House correctly to summarise the import of the evidence:—"The defender was curator bonis to the late Mrs Allan. At Whitsunday 1878 he lent £2700 of his ward's funds to Messrs Kinnes, builders in Dundee. The security was a tenement of houses, shops, and workshops, situated in Victoria Road, Dundee. Victoria Road was a new street then in course of formation, in the line of an old street, known as Bucklemaker's Wynd, which had been removed, or was in course of removal by the Dundee Improvement Trust. When the loan was arranged [in February 1878] the tenement in question was not nearly completed; but at Whitsunday 1878, when the money was advanced, the houses and shops were finished, the workshops being also finished except as regards their internal fittings. At that date also the houses were let and occupied, as were also one or perhaps two of the shops; but the workshops were unlet and unoccupied, and have never yet been more than partially let. The loan was made on an estimated rental, made up from the plans, and on a valuation proceeding on that rental, obtained by the borrower, and furnished by his agent to the curator. The valuation brought out a value of £4200, the rental being estimated by the valuator at about £300. The valuation was by Mr M'Laren, architect, Dundee, a gentleman of undoubted character and professional standing. The buildings themselves were not examined, except that they were visited by the valuator when in course of erection, and also by the curator's partner in business, who took charge of the transaction. The security has, in result, proved wholly inadequate. The curator has for some years been in possession, and the interest is at present in arrear to the amount of over £300. The gross rental has never exceeded £250, and is at present only £237; and the feu-duty being £73, and the taxes and repairs considerable, there is no doubt that the interest is unsecured, and that the property, if now sold, would realise considerably less than the amount of the loan. These facts are undisputed."

No. 204.
July 7, 1891.
Crabbe v. Whyte.

On 10th April 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender is not entitled to take credit in his accounts, as curator, for the sum of £2700, invested by him as at Whitsunday 1878 on the security of the house property in Dundee, referred to on record: Finds that he is bound—on receiving an assignation of the said security and payment, or credit in his account for all sums of interest received therefrom and credited to the ward in his account—to replace in the funds of the curatory the said sum of £2700, with interest at the rate of four per cent per annum from the date of the loan until replacement: Finds that the curator's account falls to be corrected accordingly: Appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure: Grants leave to reclaim." *

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—On the facts the case was distinguishable from Raes v. Meek,[1] and in accordance with the law there laid down in the House of Lords, the defender had used the reasonable care

* "OPINION.—(After the narrative of the facts quoted above)—I do not enter into some other matters which bulk largely in the proof, and as to which there is more or less controversy. I refer to the unsubstantial character of the buildings, the non-allocation of the feu-duty, and certain departures from the plan which reduced the cost of the building. The facts as I have stated them are, as I have said, undisputed, and are enough for my judgment.

"The question is, whether the ward's representatives are bound to accept or are entitled to repudiate the investment. They say that it was a bad investment, and that the curator has failed to shew that he used ordinary care and prudence in making it.

"I consider that there is no law applicable in such cases except the general rule that a trustee must exercise in making investments ordinary care and prudence. Certain subordinate rules are said to have been established by the decisions, but I doubt whether that is so. More particularly, I hesitate to say, universally, that a loan is bad merely because the security consists of unfinished or unoccupied buildings. Such a loan certainly requires to be justified, but cases may be conceived in which it might be so. So also it is not, I think, conclusive that the loan has been made on what is called a borrower's valuation, or that the premises forming the security have been converted to some new purpose, or are situated in a new street or a new locality. All these things separately might pass; and I do not consider that either the recent case of Rae v. Meek or any of the numerous cases there cited have established any rule of law to the contrary.

"But the present case presents an unfortunate combination of unfavourable features. There is not, indeed, any suggestion of improper motive. The curator, I do not doubt, did for his ward what he would have done for himself; and, in so far as he erred, he did so, I have no doubt, in company with other experienced men of business whom long immunity had at that period led into loose practice. But, however honest the curator was, I am unable to hold that a loan can be supported as a proper trust investment which is made on the security of unlet or unfinished buildings in a new and unestablished street, and which proceeds upon a valuation obtained by the borrower, and based upon an estimated rental calculated from plans and untested by experience. All these features unfortunately concur here, and where they do concur I fear there is no room for doubt that a curator or trustee who makes such a loan does so at his own risk, and is bound to replace the money advanced when required to do so by the beneficiaries.

"I shall therefore find that the curator is bound to account for the sum of £2700 in question, with interest from the date of the loan at the rate of four per cent; he, on the other hand, receiving credit for all interest hitherto paid, and being entitled to receive an assignation of the security in his own favour, and at his own expense."

[1] Raes v. Meek, July 19, 1889, 15 R. 1033, Aug. 8, 1889, 16 R. (H. L.) 31.

No. 204.
July 7, 1891.
Crabbe v. Whyte.

which a man of ordinary prudence would shew in the management of his own affairs.

The Court made avizandum, intimating that if necessary they would call on the pursuer.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy, in which it is found that the defender, a curator bonis, is not entitled to take credit in his account for a sum of £2700, which the Lord Ordinary holds to have been invested on insufficient security. The security consisted of a tenement of houses, shops and workshops, which at the time of arranging the loan were being put up in a street in Dundee, which is described as being then in course of reconstruction. I cannot state the facts on which the liability of the curator bonis is said to be founded better or more shortly than by reading a few sentences from the Lord Ordinary's judgment. "The loan was made on an estimated rental made up from the plans, and on a valuation proceeding on that rental, obtained by the borrower, and furnished by his agent to the curator. The valuation brought out a value of £4200, the rental being estimated by the valuator at about £300. The valuation was by Mr Maclaren, architect, Dundee, a gentleman of undoubted character and professional standing. The buildings themselves were not examined, except that they were visited by the valuator when in course of erection, and also by the curator's partner in business, who took charge of the transaction. The security has, in result, proved wholly inadequate. The curator has for some years been in possession, and the interest is at present in arrear to the amount of over £300. The gross rental has never exceeded £250, and is at present only £237; and the feu-duty being £73, and the taxes and repairs considerable, there is no doubt that the interest is unsecured, and that the property, if now sold, would realise considerably less than the amount of the loan." These facts, as the Lord Ordinary observes, are undisputed.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the obligation of a trustee in the matter of investments is that he shall exercise ordinary care and prudence in judging of the sufficiency of the security offered. In the two recent cases in the House of Lords, Knox v. Mackinnon (Aug. 7, 1888, 15 R. (H. L.) 83), and Raes v. Meek, the diligence required of a trustee was described as that which a prudent man of business would use in his own affairs. In applying this rule we must of course assume parallel cases. A prudent man of business may be a builder by profession, or a dealer in subjects which are more or less speculative, but which on the average of all his transactions yield him a profitable return. Such an illustration is evidently not at all to the point. We must suppose a prudent man desirous of placing a sum of money in a state of safe investment, such as will produce only the ordinary interest of a loan on heritable security. The point for consideration is then the safety of the security. I shall not be thought to state the rule with undue severity against trustees when I say that a trustee will, in my view, only be personally responsible for losses when it appears that he has not made due inquiry as to the safety of the security, and that the security is not in fact such as a trustee ought to accept.

A trustee is not required to exercise a personal judgment in matters of professional skill; he is therefore entitled to act on the opinion of a conscientious and skilful valuator selected by himself to advise him as to the suitability of the property as a security for trust money. If he takes such advice and acts

No. 204.
July 7, 1891.
Crabbe v. Whyte.

according to the best of his judgment, I should not hold him responsible for supervening loss.

But again, a trustee may have omitted to take advice, and may have acted without much consideration, and loss may result. Still, if he can satisfy the Court that the investment was such as a trustee would have been advised by competent judges to accept, or that it was such as a trustee might lawfully and prudently accept, he will not be responsible, because, in the case supposed, although the trustee was negligent, the loss was not caused by his negligence, but is due to the depreciation of property or other causes.

In the present case I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the security was not such as a trustee ought to have accepted; because it was a security of a speculative character consisting of unlet and unfinished buildings, in a new and unestablished street, the rental being calculated from plans and measurements, and not based in any fair sense on actual transactions. I am also of opinion that the defender was negligent,—I do not mean that he was intentionally negligent,—only that he did not take the proper means of satisfying himself as to the suitability of the security for the purposes of trust-investment. I do not overlook the fact that the defender was furnished with a valuation prepared by an architect and valuator who is admitted to be of high standing in his profession. But this was a valuation obtained by the borrower. I assume that the valuation was a fair one, just such a valuation as might guide a company or a private lender who might be willing to lend on such security, taking on himself a certain risk for which he might be indemnified by charging suitable interest. But the opinion of the architect was never asked as to the propriety of lending trust money on such security, and I am not going to assume from the statements made in the valuation that the answer to such an inquiry would have been an affirmative answer. I think it must be taken that the defender acted without due inquiry, and without taking account of the considerations which made this heritable property an unsafe investment for trust money, and that the defender may therefore be properly required to replace the money advanced on receiving an assignation to the security. It follows, in my opinion, that the reclaiming note should be refused, and the interlocutor affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely concur with everything that the Lord Ordinary has said, both as to the facts and as to the law applicable to these facts. I think the case of Raes v. Meek is directly applicable to the present case, and rules it.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

JAMES D. TURNBULL, S.S.C.—MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 205.
July 7, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson's Executor.

ROBERT DAVIDSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—Rhind—Wilson.
RICHARD DAVIDSON (Helen Davidson's Executor), Defender (Appellant).—Jameson—Sym.

Process—Sheriff—Appeal—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 George IV. c. 120), sec. 40—Act of Sederunt, 11*th July* 1828, sec. 5.—A Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof on 2d April. On 21st May he sisted the process for a month on the motion of the defender. The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff-principal, who, on 5th June, recalled the sist, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to fix a new

No. 205.
July 7, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson's Executor.

diet of proof. On 15th June the latter fixed a new diet of proof. On 16th June the defender appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial.

Held (diss. Lord Young) that the appeal was incompetent under section 5 of A. S., 11th July 1828, as the only interlocutor allowing a proof was that of 2d April, and no appeal had been presented within fifteen days thereafter.

Kinnes v. Fleming, Jan. 15, 1881, 8 R. 386, and Williams v. Watt & Wilson, May, 28, 1889, 16 R. 687, followed.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Roxburghshire. I.

ROBERT DAVIDSON raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Roxburghshire at Jedburgh against Richard Davidson, the executor-dative of the deceased Helen Davidson, for the sum of £700, being the amount which the pursuer averred had been bequeathed to him by Helen Davidson in a holograph will.

The defender denied that the alleged will was in the handwriting of the deceased.

On 2d April 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Speirs) allowed a proof, and fixed a diet of proof.

On 7th May the Sheriff-substitute, on the motion of the defender, adjourned the proof to 28th May, and on 21st May he pronounced this interlocutor:—"On the defender's motion sists the cause for one month, in order that the defender may raise an action of reduction" of the alleged holograph will "in the Court of Session."

On 23d May the pursuer appealed to the Sheriff. Notwithstanding the appeal, the defender proceeded to raise an action of reduction of the will in question, on the ground of forgery, in the Court of Session, the summons being signeted on 1st June.

On 5th June the Sheriff (Hope) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal; recalls the interlocutor appealed against; remits to the Sheriff-substitute to fix a new diet for leading the proofs allowed by interlocutor of 2d April last."

On 15th June the Sheriff-substitute, on the pursuer's motion, assigned the 6th July as a new diet of proof.

On 16th June the defender appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session, under section 40 of the Judicature Act, in terms of section 5 of the Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828,* with a view to having the action removed to the Court of Session and conjoined with the action of reduction, and tried by jury.

The pursuer objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that the defender had failed, in terms of section 5 of the Act of Sederunt, to appeal within fifteen days of the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 2d April, which was the interlocutor allowing the proof, and which had not been brought under the review of the Sheriff, or recalled by him.[1]

Argued for the defender;—(1) The appeal was timeously presented.

* Section 5.—"Whereas it is enacted by section 40 (of the Judicature Act) that in all cases originating in the inferior Courts, in which the claim is in amount above £40, as soon as an order or interlocutor allowing a proof shall be pronounced . . . it shall be competent to advocate such cause to the Court of Session, it is enacted and declared . . . that if . . . neither party, within fifteen days in the ordinary case, and in causes before the Courts of Orkney and Shetland within thirty days after the date of such interlocutor allowing a proof, shall intimate in the inferior Court the passing of a bill of advocation, such proof may immediately thereafter effectually proceed in the inferior Court . . . and if within these periods respectively no intimation shall be made of any such bill of advocation, the proof shall then proceed, and the bill, if such have been presented, together with the passing thereof, shall be held to fall as if such bill had never been presented."

[1] Authorities.—Kinnes v. Fleming, Jan. 15, 1881, 8 R. 386; Williams v. Watt & Wilson, May 28, 1889, 16 R. 687.

No. 205.

July 7, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson's Executor.

It was within fifteen days of the Sheriff's interlocutor of 5th June. Under the appeal to the Sheriff all the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute were submitted to his review, in terms of section 29 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70). In his interlocutor he might have discharged the proof, or of new allowed proof. His interlocutor was one in effect allowing proof. In the cases founded on by the pursuer fifteen days had elapsed from the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor, as well as from that of the Sheriff-substitute. (2) Even if it should be held that the appeal was not presented within fifteen days of the interlocutor allowing proof, that period of time had not been fixed by an Act of Parliament, but by an Act of Sederunt. The Court had therefore a discretion in the matter. They were not absolutely bound by an Act passed by themselves for the purpose of regulating procedure in the Court. The case of Boyd, Gilmour, & Co.[1] shewed that the Act of Sederunt was not to be rigidly adhered to where grave injustice would be done, and that it was in the discretion of the Court to enforce its penal provisions. The reason of a limit of fifteen days being fixed by the Act of Sederunt was that the proof might "immediately thereafter effectually proceed"; but in this case there was interjected an interlocutor sisting the process, so that the proof could not effectually proceed till the sist was removed.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is unfortunate that in the circumstances of the present case we should be called upon to decide a question of such importance. But seeing that it has been forced on our attention, we must determine it in accordance with the decisions in prior cases of a similar kind.

In this case the Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof on 2d April 1891. In allowing a proof he took the usual and proper course of appointing the diet of proof for a day more than fifteen days beyond the date of his interlocutor, in order that the defender, who was the party who had not moved for proof, might, if he thought proper, appeal within fifteen days in terms of the Act of Sederunt, 1828. The defender took no steps of any kind till 7th May, long after the fifteen days had expired; even then he only moved that the diet of proof should be adjourned.

The question for us to decide is whether the right of appeal under the Act of Sederunt falls if not taken within fifteen days. That it does has been conclusively and definitely settled by numerous decisions. We ourselves have had recently before us the case of Williams v. Watt & Wilson, in which we held the point was decided, and in the words of Lord Young in that case, that "the meaning of the Act of Sederunt has been determined, and we cannot go back on the cases that have settled it." In the present case there has been no appeal up to 16th June, although proof was allowed on 2d April. In accordance with the decided cases, especially Kinnes and Williams, that circumstance deprived the defender of any further right of appeal against the interlocutor allowing the proof. So strongly was that held by the Court in one case, that of Duff v. Stewart (Oct. 20, 1881, 9 R. 17), that they decided that in an action in which the value of the cause was not ascertained and the Sheriff had allowed a proof, if the party wishing to appeal did not get the property valued and obtain leave to appeal in time for him to take his appeal within the fifteen days, his right of appeal fell.

On the 21st of May the defender moved for a sist on the ground that he was about to raise an action of reduction in the Court of Session, his object plainly being to get the case removed to the Court of Session ob contingentiam. The Sheriff-substitute allowed the sist. The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, who, on 5th June, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal; recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Remits to the Sheriff-substitute to fix a new diet for leading the proofs allowed by interlocutor of 2d April last." Nothing can be more plain than that the Sheriff's interlocutor does not deal with an appeal against the interlocutor of 2d April on the question of proof; that interlocutor still stood, and the only reference the Sheriff made to it was to remit to the Sheriff-substitute to fix a new diet for leading the proof. It was suggested that if the terms of the Sheriff's interlocutor had been different, that if instead of fixing a new diet he had of new allowed a proof, an appeal would have been competent. As to that, I express no opinion. It has no bearing on the present case. There cannot be any doubt that an allowance of proof may be treated as if it had lapsed, and a proof of new allowed. Where that happens, it may be that one of the parties may get the advantage of that by having the power to appeal under the Act of Sederunt set up for another period of fifteen days. But nothing of the kind occurred here, no proof was allowed except upon the 2d of April, and no appeal was taken within fifteen days thereafter. In the case of Kinnes the Lord President rules it to be absolutely decided that an appeal is incompetent, on the footing that the Sheriff's interlocutor was not one allowing proof. In my opinion the interlocutor of the Sheriff in this case is exactly in the same position.

[1] Boyd, Gilmour, & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Nov. 16, 1888, 16 R. 104.

No. 205.

July 7, 1891. Davidson v. Davidson's Executor.

A distinction was attempted to be made between this case and the cases already decided, viz., that in the latter the appeal was taken after the expiration of fifteen days from the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor, the fact being that the Sheriff did not fix a new diet of proof, but that this was done by the Sheriff-substitute on a later date, while in the present case the appeal was taken within fifteen days from the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor, by which he remitted to fix a new diet. In my opinion this makes no difference in the present circumstances, as the proof was allowed by the Sheriff-substitute, and his interlocutor allowing proof was never brought under the review of the Sheriff, and the Sheriff does not by his interlocutor dispose of any question of allowing a proof. It only put matters in train for carrying out the allowance of proof which was made by the Sheriff-substitute on 2d April, and which is a standing interlocutor, and the only interlocutor in the case by which a proof is allowed.

I am therefore of opinion that we must hold this appeal in which we are called on to bring the case here from the Sheriff Court incompetent, as not having been timeously taken. I understand the object of the defender is to get the Sheriff Court process absorbed in the action of reduction at present running its course in the Outer-House. Our present decision does not prevent him getting this done if the Lord Ordinary, on a motion being made to have the cause remitted ob contingentiam, thinks such a course competent. All that we decide is that this present appeal is incompetent.

LORD YOUNG.—I regard the question of the competency of this appeal as one of extensive interest and importance. But, in my opinion, the parties would have acted wisely in avoiding its discussion by agreeing between themselves or taking the opinion of the Court—if agreement was impossible—upon the question, whether it was most fitting that the real point of dispute between the parties should or should not be tried along with the action of reduction now in the Outer-House. One of the parties was willing that this should be done, but the pursuer thought it would be for his advantage to refuse to concur in that course being followed, and has pressed the question of the competency of this appeal on our consideration.

No. 205.
July 7, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson's Executor.

The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute allowing the parties a proof of their respective averments, which, we are now told, involve a question of forgery, was dated 2d April 1891. From that date down to the 21st May—not a very long time—the defender appears to have been making inquiries regarding the genuineness of the will. He made various motions to the Sheriff-substitute to postpone the proof till the result of his inquiries was known, and to some purpose, for on 7th May, on the motion of the defender, the Sheriff-substitute adjourned the date of the proof till 28th May, and before the latter date he was induced to sist the case for a month in order that an action of reduction of the will in question might be brought by the defender in the Court of Session. All that shews that the defender desired to avoid a proof in the Sheriff Court, and all his actings were directed against the interlocutor allowing the proof. On 23d May, after the interlocutor allowing the sist, the pursuer appealed to the Sheriff.

Now, by clause 29 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, it is provided that an appeal to the Sheriff "shall be effectual to submit to the review of the Sheriff the whole interlocutors and judgments pronounced in the cause, not only at the instance of the appellant, but also at the instance of every other party appearing in the appeal, to the effect of enabling the Sheriff to do complete justice without hindrance from the terms of any interlocutor in the cause and without the necessity of any counter appeal." I should have thought it too clear to be disputed that this appeal to the Sheriff was effectual to submit to his review the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute allowing a proof. That interlocutor did not become final on 17th April, it was appealable to the Sheriff, and was submitted to his review by the appeal of 23d May. If it was otherwise the Sheriff could not have done anything but allow a proof, but it is conceded by all parties that the Sheriff might have refused to allow the proof. In short, it is admitted as clear that the interlocutor allowing the proof was subject to the revision of the Sheriff by reason of the appeal of 23d May, and that he might have recalled that interlocutor. He, however, thought that the proof should proceed. It is not right, in my opinion, to say that he did not address his mind to the question of proof. He addressed his mind to that question, and to nothing else; he refused to sist the process and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to fix a new diet of proof. Was the interlocutor of 2d April not in suspense till the Sheriff pronounced his judgment of 5th June? It was not if the Sheriff had no power to deal with it, but if the parties are right that the Sheriff might have recalled the interlocutor, it was in suspense. That, in my opinion, is clear.

The question is, do, under the Act of Sederunt, the fifteen days run from the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor? On that question I have quite a distinct opinion that they do so run. It was said that the case had been settled by authority, but, in my opinion, there is no authority on the point. In neither Kinnes nor Williams could the question have arisen, because, although in both these cases there was an appeal to the Sheriff, there was no appeal to this Court till long after fifteen days had expired from the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor. But in the present case there was an appeal to this Court within fifteen days of the Sheriff's interlocutor, and on that fact my opinion rests.

I shall advert to these two cases—your Lordship mentioned also the case of

No. 205.
July 7, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson's Executor.

Duff; it has no bearing on the point, not the least. In the cases of Kinnes and Williams, after the Sheriff had pronounced an interlocutor similar to the one pronounced here, the Sheriff-substitute of new fixed a diet of proof. It was held that the appeal to this Court could not be maintained, unless it could be shewn to the Court that an appeal within fifteen days of the interlocutor allowing the proof had been competently taken. No appeal was taken within fifteen days of the Sheriff's judgment, and if the Act of Sederunt applied at all, the contention of the appellant must have been that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute fixing a new diet of proof was an interlocutor allowing a proof, but it was held that it was not. But the Court did not hold that the interlocutor of the Sheriff was or was not one allowing a proof, since no appeal was taken within fifteen days from its date. I was a concurring party in the judgment of Williams, which was similar to the case of Kinnes, and was decided on the same grounds.

In the present case, however, we have before us a distinct question which arises for the first time. Does an interlocutor allowing proof, which is brought by appeal under the Sheriff's consideration remain in suspense by reason of the statutory provisions in regard to the appeal till the Sheriff disposes of it? In my opinion the interlocutor of the Sheriff in the present case is one allowing proof in substance and effect, and the question ought to be answered affirmatively so that the fifteen days during which an appeal to this Court is competent run from the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor.

The general interest and importance of the question is at once apparent. If it is answered otherwise than as I have indicated, if an appeal from the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute be taken to the Sheriff, and he does not dispose of the case for six months or any other period beyond fifteen days, and then dismisses the appeal, and remits to the Sheriff-substitute to take the proof, in that case the proof must be taken in the Sheriff Court, and if the case were thereafter appealed to us and then to the House of Lords our judgment on the facts would be final, so that it could not be disputed by the Court of last resort. But the object of the Judicature Act in allowing an appeal such as the present was that our judgment should not be final on the question of fact. The importance and grave significance of the question is illustrated by a judgment which was pronounced the other day in the House of Lords. There a proof was taken in this Court in a case which had been appealed here from the Sheriff Court, and we pronounced findings of fact in that case which were reversed in the House of Lords. Now, if the proof in that case had been taken in the Sheriff Court and we had pronounced exactly similar findings they would have been final, and could not have been reversed.

The question is therefore of great importance, and I have given expression to some of the considerations which an important question occurring for the first time has occasioned in my mind. On the whole matter I am of opinion this appeal should be sustained.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I think this appeal is incompetent. The only interlocutor allowing a proof is that of 2d April, and no appeal was taken by the defender within fifteen days of that interlocutor. I think the decision in this case turns on the question whether the Act of Sederunt applies in this sense that the appeal must be taken within fifteen days of the interlocutor allowing the proof. I think this question is determined affirmatively by the cases bearing on the point.

No. 205.
July 7, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson's Executor.

Of course if the Sheriff-substitute pronounces an interlocutor allowing a proof, and that interlocutor is appealed to the Sheriff, the days during which an appeal may be taken to this Court do not run from the date of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, but from that of the Sheriff. In this case, however, the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute allowing a proof was never brought under the notice of the Sheriff. All that was done by him was to appoint a new diet of proof; this means nothing more than recalling the sist. I think, therefore, that the case is in this position, that there is no interlocutor allowing a proof except that of 2d April, and no appeal having been taken by the defender within fifteen days he is barred from now appealing the case here.

LORD TRAYNER.—I confess I was not able to appreciate the value or relevancy of much of the argument that was addressed to us from the bar. The question here is whether this appeal is or is not competent under the fifth section of the Act of Sederunt of 1828. The words of that section, as they have been interpreted by various decisions, are to the effect that if an appeal is not taken within fifteen days from the date of the interlocutor allowing a proof, the right of appeal falls. The only interlocutor allowing a proof that I can find in the present proceedings is that of the Sheriff-substitute dated 2d April 1891; and if the fifteen days for appealing are to be reckoned from that date then this appeal is incompetent, not having been taken within the prescribed period. It is said, however, that when the pursuer appealed against the interlocutor of 21st May, by which the Sheriff-substitute sisted process for a month, he also brought up for review the earlier interlocutor allowing a proof. That the pursuer could under his appeal to the Sheriff have submitted to review the interlocutor allowing a proof, and all previous interlocutors, is certain. I think, however, that he did not do so. Lord Young thinks the Sheriff applied his mind to the question whether there should be a proof, because he remits to the Sheriff-substitute "to fix a new diet for leading the proof allowed by interlocutor of 2d April last." I think the Sheriff applied his mind to nothing but the question of the sist, and that his interlocutor would have been in effect the same if, refusing the pursuer's appeal, he had remitted to the Sheriff-substitute "to proceed with the cause." But such an interlocutor could not be read as one allowing a proof. I think, farther, it is clear that the Sheriff had no intention of allowing a proof, for he directs the Sheriff-substitute to proceed with the cause under an existing order for proof, with which he, the Sheriff, does not interfere. It was suggested that where an interlocutor of a Sheriff-substitute allowing a proof was appealed against, and the appeal not decided upon for more than fifteen days, the right of appeal would be lost, if the appeal in this case was held incompetent. There is no room for apprehension on this head, because in such a case the interlocutor of the Sheriff affirming his Substitute's interlocutor would in itself be regarded as an interlocutor allowing a proof, from which the fifteen days for appealing under the Act of Sederunt of 1828 would be reckoned. This has been so decided. I concur with the majority of your Lordships in thinking the present appeal incompetent. I think we could not hold otherwise without setting aside the decisions in the cases of Kinnes and Williams.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.

Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

JOHN MACLAY MURRAY AND ANOTHER (Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Company, Limited), Petitioners (Respondents).—D.-F. Balfour—Burnet.

WILLIAM LAW, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Asher—Strachan—Ure.

Company—Winding-up—Agreement to give fully paid-up shares—30 and 31 Vict. c. 131 (Companies Act, 1867), sec. 25.*—A person who had sold a paper mill, &c. to a limited company, formed for the purpose of acquiring it and carrying on the business, for the sum of £12,000, agreed to take £8500 of the price in fully paid-up shares of the company. This agreement appeared in the minutes of the directors of the company, and was carried out by the issue of shares to the vendor, but was never filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies.

The company having become insolvent and gone into liquidation, the liquidators proposed to place the vendor on the list of contributories in respect of shares so issued and still held by him, with liability to the amount of the uncalled capital effeiring to them. The vendor maintained that the shares must be treated as fully paid up, and that no liability attached to him in respect of them.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling) that he must be placed on the list of contributories with liability as contended for by the liquidators, dis. Lord Young, who was of opinion that the transaction, following on the agreement, was virtually a payment in cash for the shares to their full value by the vendor.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Stormonth Darling. M.

BY agreement, dated 8th and 11th January 1886, William Law, proprietor of Coustonholm Paper Mills, near Glasgow, the first party, agreed to sell to T. F. Weir, S.S.C., the second party, these mills and their appurtenances at the price of £12,000, that Mr Weir might promote a company to acquire them and to carry on the business. The agreement bore that the purchase price was to be payable thus, viz.:—"£4500 in fully paid-up shares, certificate of which shall be delivered to the first party within at latest three months from the registration of the company, and the balance of £7500 by the limited company to be formed as aforesaid freeing and relieving the first party of his liability under and becoming responsible for the bonds, obligations, and securities for which the first party is at present liable in relation to the said business."

The company was formed, the capital being £25,000 in 2500 shares of £10 each. The memorandum of association set forth that the objects of the company were to purchase the Coustonholm Paper Mills, &c., and carry on their business, and "to adopt and carry out" the agreement between Law and Weir already referred to. This memorandum was dated 7th April 1886, and the company was registered on 13th April 1886.

The agreement of January 1886 was not carried out in terms by the company. At a meeting of the directors on 24th March 1886 it was minuted, "In respect the price of the mill, amounting to £12,000, less amount of bonds, say £3500, will amount to £8500, Mr Law has consented to accept of the entire sum of £8500 in fully paid-up shares of the company." Mr Law was present at the meeting and acquiesced in this arrangement.

This second agreement was adopted by the company at a general meeting on 28th July 1886.

---

* Sec. 25.—"Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing, and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares."

No. 206.
July 8, 1891.
Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

Following out the agreement of 24th March, shares were issued to Mr Law certified as fully paid up. In the books of the company Mr Law was credited with the price, and debited with the amount of the shares.

The company was ordered to be wound up by an interlocutor of the Second Division, dated 11th June 1889. At this time 150 shares stood in Mr Law's name, 130 of which had been issued to him originally, and twenty acquired by him from his son-in-law, Mr Wilson. He had parted with the other shares originally issued to him. At the date of the liquidation the full amount of the capital had not been called up.

The liquidators proposed to place Mr Law on the list of contributories for 150 shares, rendering him liable to payment of the calls still due and unpaid on these shares. Law objected, and to try the question a record was made up.

The liquidators pleaded;—(2) No contract relative to the said 130 shares, or the payment thereof, having been filed with the Registrar, the said 130 shares must be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, in terms of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Law pleaded;—(1) The shares held by the respondent must, in the circumstances condescended on, be held as paid in cash, and no further liability in respect thereof attaches. (2) The shares standing in the respondent's name having been accepted by him in lieu of the company's obligation to relieve the respondent of his debts and liabilities in connection with said business, were in reality paid for in cash. (4) In respect that the said agreement was fully set forth in the memorandum and articles of association, the requisites of the statute were complied with, and no liability now attaches in respect of said shares.

It was admitted by minute that Wilson never paid any cash or gave any consideration for the twenty shares issued to him, and that this fact was well known to Law. In consequence of this admission the question came to be confined to the 130 shares.

Lord Stormonth Darling (Ordinary), on 27th February 1891, repelled the pleas for the respondent, found that the respondent was "rightly entered by the liquidators in the list of contributories appended to the note, No. 24 of process, as holder of 150 shares; that the said shares must be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash." *

---

* "OPINION—. . . . As regards the whole of the shares it is admitted that there was no registered contract, and as regards 20 of them it was conceded at the bar that no cash had been paid, and that Mr Law knew this when they were transferred to him, but as regards the remaining 130 shares it was maintained on his behalf that although no cash was paid for them the company were bound to relieve him of certain obligations to his creditors, including a debt of £2500 to the Clydesdale Bank; that the company failed to fulfil this obligation; that he was compelled to take the shares in lieu thereof, and therefore that the shares must be held to have been paid in cash. Reliance was placed on a series of English cases which relax the strict words of the statute—to this extent, that where money is due by the company to the intending shareholder on the one hand, and by the intending shareholder to the company on the other, and the parties agree to set the one demand of money against the other, that shall be held to be a good payment in cash. The cases are Spargo, L. R., 1873, 8 Ch. App. 407; Ferrao's, 1874, L. R., 9 Ch. App. 355; Barrow-in-Furness, 1880, L. R., 14 Ch. Div. 400; Jones, Lloyd, and Co., 1889, L. R., 41 Ch. Div. 159.

"Though I am not bound by these decisions, I should think it right to follow them on a question affecting the construction of a British statute, and not turning on any peculiarity of Scots law, if the facts were such as to warrant their application. But I think the facts are the other way. These facts, so far

No. 206.
July 8, 1891.
Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

being fully paid-up shares under an agreement by which he contracted to convey property to the company, and to take shares in payment of the price of the property handed over.

The case has been repeatedly and anxiously considered by the Court since the debate upon it was heard, and in now stating the opinion at which I have ultimately arrived I desire to express my feeling that no more time has been spent upon it than its importance demanded, whether from a general point of view, or in view of the party's interest to which I have already alluded.

The affairs of the Coustonholm Paper Mills Company, Limited, are in course of being wound up under an order of this Court pronounced on 11th June 1889. The present proceedings relate to certain shares of the company held by William Law, on which the liquidators demand that Mr Law shall pay the whole amount, it being not disputed that he holds these shares, and that he has not directly paid for them in cash. Mr Law, on the other hand, maintains that although he has not directly paid in cash, he has done so indirectly, in respect that by agreement he made over certain property to the Coustonholm Paper Company, and took payment of the price in fully paid-up shares.

The history of the transaction is clear, and is not in dispute. Mr Law was formerly proprietor of the Coustonholm Paper Mill, and entered into negotiations for its sale with Mr Weir, S.S.C., who was acting for an intended company, the result of which was that he agreed to sell and Weir agreed to buy at a price of £12,000, the buyers stipulating that £4500 of the amount should be payable in fully paid-up shares of the new company, and that the balance of £7500 was to be met by the company relieving Mr Law of his liability under certain bonds, obligations, and securities, in which he was debtor. It was also part of the agreement that, with the exception of shares to the value of £800, all the other shares were to be subscribed for and paid in cash in the usual way. The shares included in the £800 worth were to be issued as fully paid-up to a firm of engineers for work to be done at the mill.

Mr Law was an active promoter of the company, and was appointed its managing director. At the first meeting of directors, on 24th March 1886, he was present as a director, and at that meeting an important change was made upon the agreement as it had been adjusted between Mr Weir and Mr Law. The company was freed from the obligation to take over Mr Law's liabilities except in so far as these were upon heritable bonds, which amounted to about £3500, and agreed to pay Mr Law the whole balance of the price, namely, £8500, in fully paid-up shares. The result of this arrangement was that the debt which was upon the property was transferred to the company and became their liability, and that Mr Law took, as representing the balance of the price, shares fully paid-up to the amount of £8500, remaining liable for the other debts.

Mr Law having received the shares, negotiated himself with his creditors, and induced them to accept transfers of shares from him in satisfaction of their claims, and no question arises in this case in regard to shares so transferred by him to others. But when the paper company went into liquidation he held 150 shares, and it is upon these that the liquidators now insist that he shall pay. As regards twenty of these shares there is no question. They were originally allotted to a Mr Wilson to qualify him for the directorate. No cash was paid for them, and they were transferred to Mr Law without value. The question truly relates therefore to the 130 shares, which were issued to Mr Law as part of the consideration for which he conveyed his property to the company.

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.
Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

Court was therefore free to consider the case on principle. But, if there might be some difficulty in holding under the second agreement that the shares had been paid in cash, there was no such difficulty under the first, for there the company was bound to relieve Law of obligations to his creditors, i.e., pay money for him. Now, it was this agreement which ruled the matter. It was distinctly referred to in the memorandum of association, and that memorandum was the charter of the company. It defined its business. The articles were only rules for carrying it on. There was no such reference in the Northumberland Avenue Hotel case, quoted on the other side.[1] [Some productions were made with the object of shewing that the 130 shares were issued to Law in lieu of part of the £7500 stipulated in the first agreement, and were no part of the shares issued to meet the £4500, the other stipulation in that agreement. It was unnecessary for the Court to determine this question in view of the opinions entertained by them on other points.]

Argued for the liquidators;—If the case was to be argued on principle, the principle was not far to seek. The object of the statute was to ensure that the nominal capital was really subscribed, or if it were not, that the other shareholders and the public should have notice of its absence. Hence, if there was an agreement binding the company to pay money, that might be set off, for the capital of the company would have to go to pay that money. But where there was no such liability, then to make shares fully paid up when no money was due to the holder of them which could be paid by set-off was per ambages to diminish the capital of the company. Now, here the company was never liable to pay money. The ruling agreement was the second agreement, and under it Law could claim no money, all he could ask for was shares. The rule in England was that a person whom it was endeavoured to make a contributory could not defend himself by anything short of a plea of payment. A plea of "accord and satisfaction" would not do.[2] A newspaper company which had inserted advertisements for a company on an unregistered agreement to get fully paid-up shares were held liable to pay calls.[3] A creditor of the company on a money payment not instantly due, if also a shareholder, must pay his calls in cash.[4] That was a strong illustration of the necessity of there being a money obligation in contradistinction to any other obligation. The second agreement was the binding agreement here, for the first was not binding on the company, never having been adopted by them.[5] But even if the first agreement was assumed to rule the case, it was not possible to say which shares, if any, were referable to the £7500, and the result was that the contributory must go on the list for the whole of them.[6]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is one of considerable importance to the law, and of very great importance to one of the parties, relating as it does to the question of the liability of a holder of shares in a limited company to pay the amount of them in cash, in a case in which he has bona fide accepted them as

[1] 1886, L. R., 33 Ch. Div. 16.
[2] Fothergill's case, 1873, L. R., 8 Ch. App. 270; Spargo, cited by Lord Ordinary.
[3] Pagin & Gill's case, 1877, L. R., 6 Ch. Div. 681; Andress' case, 1878, L. R., Ch. Div. 126 (see Thesiger, L. J.).
[4] Kent's case, 1888, L. R., 39 Ch. Div. 259; contrast Jones, Lloyd, & Co., 89, 41 Ch. Div. 159.
[5] Empress Engineering Co., 1880, L. R., 16 Ch. Div. 125.
[6] Fothergill's case, ut supra.

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.

Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

ever. They are under no obligation to Mr Law which would entitle him to demand any money from them, if his demand was for implement of the agreement. Standing the agreement, his sole right as against the company is to have a certain quantity of shares made over to him as fully paid-up shares. If in fulfilment of the agreement the company tender to him shares, the nominal value of which amounts to the price set forth in the agreement, they have fulfilled their part of the agreement, and it matters not whether the true market value of the shares in money is a much less amount. On the other hand, if the shares were at a premium, so that on obtaining them a much larger sum could be realised than the money value of the property on which the agreement is based, the company could not refuse to deliver to him the same number of shares as if they were at par value. Thus it is not a money price to which he is entitled under the agreement, but shares the nominal value of which corresponds to the money price. Mr Law took all the prospects good or bad of the transaction. He had under his bargain no right to money from the company. He had a right to shares, and nothing else.

It is said that Mr Law, by his agreement with Mr Weir, agreed to sell his property "at the price of £12,000 sterling," and that this is inconsistent with the case for the liquidators. I do not think so. It was necessary to fix a price for the property as a basis for determining what number of shares should be handed over under the other head of the agreement. At least that was the natural way of ascertaining it. The two heads of the agreement cannot be taken separately. They must be read together, with reference to their bearing the one upon the other. I hold the effect of the agreement to be the same as if it had expressed the agreed-on value and the agreed-on principle of settlement in one article—as if it had said at the end of article 1 of the agreement, after the words "£12,000 sterling," "which price it is hereby agreed shall not be payable in cash, but the said first party agrees that the said price shall be payable as follows," and so on.

It may test the question to consider what would have been the state of matters had Mr Law, after entering into the agreement, demanded payment of the price in cash. Would it not have been a conclusive answer on the part of the company to say, "we have no agreement with you to pay cash, we have only undertaken to deliver to you certain shares, these we tender"; can it be doubted that their position would be unassailable? But if the company could resist a demand for cash, how can it be said that Mr Law paid for his shares in cash? His bargain was for shares on the distinct footing that they were to be handed over to him without his paying cash for them, not as a substitute for cash which he had a right to, but in fulfilment of the stipulation in which his claim against the company was to be met by an issue of shares. The question whether he would get what really represented in value the £12,000, or what would be of less value or of more value was a speculative question, and the transaction was on Mr Law's part essentially speculative. He had no right to £12,000 or any other sum. He had only a right to shares of that nominal value. Had the company failed to fulfil their part of the agreement by issuing the shares to him, I cannot think that his remedy would have been to maintain that he had sold the property to the company for £12,000, and to sue them for that sum. If he maintained the contract, he could only maintain his right to receive certain shares. If he desired to state an alternative, it appears to me that the only alternative he could state would be one of damages. And the measure of his damage would be the loss he sustained by not getting the shares issued to him.

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.
Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

I come therefore, after the best care I have been able to give to the consideration of the case, but in the end without doubt or hesitation, to the conclusion that Mr Law's shares being under the 25th clause of the Companies Act shares which must be deemed to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, they have not been paid in cash, and that as "the same have not been determined otherwise by a contract duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies" in terms of that Act, the liquidators' plea must prevail.

But it is said that this view of the matter is contrary to decisions which have been pronounced in England. Although we would not necessarily be bound by decisions of the English Courts, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that where there are English decisions giving distinct opinions upon the interpretation to be given to a British statute, we ought to follow them, unless there seems to be very strong ground for doubting their soundness. But it is necessary before considering that matter to ascertain whether the English decisions do result in a different view of the law from that which commends itself to us, looking at the question from our own standpoint. Now, in this particular case, after examining the English cases, I am satisfied that they in no way conflict with the opinion which I have expressed, and that, as I said before, they only decide that payment of shares may be made without an actual passing of money or cheques, in cases where there is on each side of the transaction an obligation to pay cash, and the claim for cash on each side is held to be paid by the discharge of the other.

The leading case in which this was held was the case of Spargo. If that case be examined, it will be found to be essentially different from the present, although resembling it in some of its external features. Spargo sold a mine to a company. The sale was for cash, and the company could have had no defence against a demand for an actual cash payment in settlement of the price. He also applied for and had allotted to him in the ordinary way a quantity of shares of the new company. What then occurred was this, that instead of the company paying him a cheque for the whole price of the mine, and he paying them a cheque for the whole price of the shares, he was credited with the one sum and debited with the other, and a balance having been brought out against him, he paid that balance in cash. In short, instead of handing money backwards and forwards unnecessarily, the contracts of both parties were implemented by ascertaining a balance of money liability, and by the person who on making up the account was due the balance paying it. In short, it was a mere convenient mode of settlement, but in no way affected the rights of parties. Spargo actually paid for his shares. They were not delivered to him as being fully paid shares. He took them under the agreed-on obligation of an ordinary applicant for an allotment, that he should pay for them, and he did pay for them. The company, on the other hand, did not pay the price of the mine in shares. They paid according to their agreement in cash. All that was decided by the Court in that case was this, that although each party had a right to be paid in money for what he was selling, it was not indispensable to its being held that the money was paid that the actual cash, or equivalents of cash, should be in forma specifica handed back and forward. The case is, in my judgment, entirely different from this case.

The present case seems to me to have much more resemblance to a subsequent

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.

Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

ever. They are under no obligation to Mr Law which would entitle him to demand any money from them, if his demand was for implement of the agreement. Standing the agreement, his sole right as against the company is to have a certain quantity of shares made over to him as fully paid-up shares. If in fulfilment of the agreement the company tender to him shares, the nominal value of which amounts to the price set forth in the agreement, they have fulfilled their part of the agreement, and it matters not whether the true market value of the shares in money is a much less amount. On the other hand, if the shares were at a premium, so that on obtaining them a much larger sum could be realised than the money value of the property on which the agreement is based, the company could not refuse to deliver to him the same number of shares as if they were at par value. Thus it is not a money price to which he is entitled under the agreement, but shares the nominal value of which corresponds to the money price. Mr Law took all the prospects good or bad of the transaction. He had under his bargain no right to money from the company. He had a right to shares, and nothing else.

It is said that Mr Law, by his agreement with Mr Weir, agreed to sell his property "at the price of £12,000 sterling," and that this is inconsistent with the case for the liquidators. I do not think so. It was necessary to fix a price for the property as a basis for determining what number of shares should be handed over under the other head of the agreement. At least that was the natural way of ascertaining it. The two heads of the agreement cannot be taken separately. They must be read together, with reference to their bearing the one upon the other. I hold the effect of the agreement to be the same as if it had expressed the agreed-on value and the agreed-on principle of settlement in one article—as if it had said at the end of article 1 of the agreement, after the words "£12,000 sterling," "which price it is hereby agreed shall not be payable in cash, but the said first party agrees that the said price shall be payable as follows," and so on.

It may test the question to consider what would have been the state of matters had Mr Law, after entering into the agreement, demanded payment of the price in cash. Would it not have been a conclusive answer on the part of the company to say, "we have no agreement with you to pay cash, we have only undertaken to deliver to you certain shares, these we tender"; can it be doubted that their position would be unassailable? But if the company could resist a demand for cash, how can it be said that Mr Law paid for his shares in cash? His bargain was for shares on the distinct footing that they were to be handed over to him without his paying cash for them, not as a substitute for cash which he had a right to, but in fulfilment of the stipulation in which his claim against the company was to be met by an issue of shares. The question whether he would get what really represented in value the £12,000, or what would be of less value or of more value was a speculative question, and the transaction was on Mr Law's part essentially speculative. He had no right to £12,000 or any other sum. He had only a right to shares of that nominal value. Had the company failed to fulfil their part of the agreement by issuing the shares to him, I cannot think that his remedy would have been to maintain that he had sold the property to the company for £12,000, and to sue them for that sum. If he maintained the contract, he could only maintain his right to receive certain shares. If he desired to state an alternative, it appears to me that the only alternative he could state would be one of damages. And the measure of his damage would be the loss he sustained by not getting the shares issued to him.

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.
Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

I come therefore, after the best care I have been able to give to the consideration of the case, but in the end without doubt or hesitation, to the conclusion that Mr Law's shares being under the 25th clause of the Companies Act shares which must be deemed to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, they have not been paid in cash, and that as "the same have not been determined otherwise by a contract duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies" in terms of that Act, the liquidators' plea must prevail.

But it is said that this view of the matter is contrary to decisions which have been pronounced in England. Although we would not necessarily be bound by decisions of the English Courts, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that where there are English decisions giving distinct opinions upon the interpretation to be given to a British statute, we ought to follow them, unless there seems to be very strong ground for doubting their soundness. But it is necessary before considering that matter to ascertain whether the English decisions do result in a different view of the law from that which commends itself to us, looking at the question from our own standpoint. Now, in this particular case, after examining the English cases, I am satisfied that they in no way conflict with the opinion which I have expressed, and that, as I said before, they only decide that payment of shares may be made without an actual passing of money or cheques, in cases where there is on each side of the transaction an obligation to pay cash, and the claim for cash on each side is held to be paid by the discharge of the other.

The leading case in which this was held was the case of Spargo. If that case be examined, it will be found to be essentially different from the present, although resembling it in some of its external features. Spargo sold a mine to a company. The sale was for cash, and the company could have had no defence against a demand for an actual cash payment in settlement of the price. He also applied for and had allotted to him in the ordinary way a quantity of shares of the new company. What then occurred was this, that instead of the company paying him a cheque for the whole price of the mine, and he paying them a cheque for the whole price of the shares, he was credited with the one sum and debited with the other, and a balance having been brought out against him, he paid that balance in cash. In short, instead of handing money backwards and forwards unnecessarily, the contracts of both parties were implemented by ascertaining a balance of money liability, and by the person who on making up the account was due the balance paying it. In short, it was a mere convenient mode of settlement, but in no way affected the rights of parties. Spargo actually paid for his shares. They were not delivered to him as being fully paid shares. He took them under the agreed-on obligation of an ordinary applicant for an allotment, that he should pay for them, and he did pay for them. The company, on the other hand, did not pay the price of the mine in shares. They paid according to their agreement in cash. All that was decided by the Court in that case was this, that although each party had a right to be paid in money for what he was selling, it was not indispensable to its being held that the money was paid that the actual cash, or equivalents of cash, should be in forma specifica handed back and forward. The case is, in my judgment, entirely different from this case.

The present case seems to me to have much more resemblance to a subsequent

No. 206.
July 8, 1891.
Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

case, that of White, in which the decision was to the same effect as that which I hold should be pronounced here. In that case, a company agreed with a newspaper proprietor that if he inserted certain advertisements he should be paid the amount chargeable for the advertisements in fully paid-up shares. The advertisements were inserted, and the proprietor made out an account and delivered it to the company, upon which the company allotted him shares to that amount as fully paid-up. The contract was not registered in terms of section 25 of the Companies Act, and the company afterwards went into liquidation. In that case Lord Justice James, who was one of the Judges who decided Spargo's case, held, without hesitation, that the liquidator's demand under the 25th section of the Act must receive effect. He held that the company never came under any obligation to pay any money, which is just the case here. He held that the bargain was that White should "accept payment in shares, and must not look for cash," which is just the case here. Therefore, he says "there never was that money demand, which was capable of being, I do not say set off in the ordinary legal sense, but set off by the parties meeting and agreeing to put debt against debt. That being so, it seems to me utterly impossible to bring the case within Spargo's case, and consequently the case must fail." I can see no distinction whatever between this case and White's case, and, on the contrary, find the grounds of Lord Justice James' judgment, in which his brethren concurred, to be entirely consistent with the views I have already expressed in the case we are dealing with.

But White's case further disposes of the very plausible argument that the naming of a definite sum or price makes the transaction for the sale of the article or property to the company practically a sale for cash, notwithstanding that there is an agreement to take shares. In White's case it was argued, and the Vice-Chancellor had given effect to the argument, that the services were rendered, and White's account for them was handed in before the issue of the shares, and the company in their letter had put their stipulation thus—"provided you are willing to accept payment of your account in fully paid-up shares." It was argued that this was a money account due by the company. But as Lord Justice Cotton pointed out, the rendering of the account was necessary for the fulfilment of the contract, in order to ascertain what quantity of shares should be allotted. It was, as he expresses it, "merely for the purpose of ascertaining the quantum, as a measure of the number of shares that were to be allotted." In this case, the ascertainment and fixing of a price by the agreement was necessary for the ascertainment of what number of shares the company would require to allot to Mr Law in order to fulfil their contract. There was no intention to contract on any other footing than that the company should allot, and Law should accept, fully paid-up shares. The agreement of price had no other purpose than to give a basis for ascertaining the number of shares to be allotted.

I have only further to point out that while this case is undoubtedly a very hard one for Mr Law, there would be hardship of a different kind if he escaped from the legal net in which unfortunately for him his feet are set. He could not be in his present position had his contract been registered. Such registration is no mere formality. It tends to the protection of the creditors of limited liability companies. It is the creditors of the company of which Mr Law was a shareholder who, through the liquidators, are insisting that he shall not be allowed now to found upon a special contract with the company, he having failed to take the steps required by statute as preliminary to his being allowed to found upon his contract in a question with creditors. Persons transacting with such companies have a right to be protected against the risk of finding in a liquidation that, although ostensibly there is a large security in the shape of unpaid capital, much of this security is taken away by large quantities of the shares issued having been allotted as fully paid-up shares. Therefore the prescription that such allotment shall be registered, otherwise the shares will be deemed to be payable in cash, is one which has a most practical purpose, and however hard the case may be of one who has failed to see that the statutory requirement has been fulfilled, he has really only himself to blame.

No. 206. July 8, 1891. Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

The view I take of the case, and which has been already expressed, makes it unnecessary to notice a subsidiary point which was raised in regard to the indentification of the particular 130 shares in question. The point seems not to have been raised before the Lord Ordinary, and as I am at one with his Lordship in disposing of the case upon the broad grounds which I have indicated, I refrain from saying anything upon it.

LORD YOUNG.—The questions which we have to decide arise in a liquidation process, and regard only 130 out of a much larger number of shares in the insolvent company which were issued to the respondent. These 130 shares now stand in the register in the respondent's name, as the holder, which he is admittedly, and the questions about them result in this one—whether or not the liquidator has rightly entered him in the register of contributories in respect thereof as being wholly unpaid. But as these questions are of a very general character, so that our opinion upon them will in its scope extend to many more shares which were issued to the respondent, the Lord Ordinary has very properly, if I may presume to say so, considered them with reference to the legal validity and effect of the contract between the respondent and the company, and all that passed between them in pursuance of it.

The respondent was the owner of certain paper mills, plant, machinery, and buildings, which the company desired to acquire for the purposes of their business. Accordingly, in January 1886, a contract was made between them whereby the former sold and the latter purchased the property "at the price of £12,000 sterling." By a term of the contract it was agreed that "the purchase price" to the extent of £4500 (which was subsequently increased to £8500) should be payable in "fully paid-up shares" in the company. The details of the contract, beyond what I have stated, are immaterial. This contract, the honesty of which is not questioned, and we have no reason to doubt, was completely executed in the sense of being implemented. The company got the property with a good title, entered into possession, and paid the price as agreed—ostensibly at least, and really as both parties believed.

Of the shares that were issued to the respondent all certified as fully paid, we are, as I have already stated, directly and immediately concerned with only 130—the remainder having been transferred by him to others on contracts of which we have no knowledge. With respect to these 130 shares, the liquidator maintains that the amount thereof, viz., £1300, not having been paid in cash, as required by section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, the respondent, as the holder, must be entered as a contributory. Whether or not the amount of these shares has been paid in cash is the question to be decided, and it turns and depends exclusively on legal considerations and argument, the facts not being in controversy. These facts I have stated fully and exhaustively so far as necessary to raise the legal question, which I propose in the first instance, and indeed principally, to consider, deferring meanwhile the statement of a detail on which what I regard as a subsidiary question has been raised.

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.

Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

It may conduce to clearness and brevity in explaining my views to regard "the whole amount" of the shares in question, viz., £1300, as the whole contract price of the property sold by the respondent to the company, and doing so cannot possibly affect the argument one way or other. And the proposition which I propose to consider is this, that if the owner of property (land or goods) being money's worth, contracts to sell it to a company at the price of £1300 sterling, agreeing by the same contract to take payment of that price in fully paid-up shares in the company, and the company takes over the property, and makes payment therefor with shares, certified as fully paid to that amount, "the whole amount" of the shares is paid in cash.

The proposition involves the consideration of two questions, viz., 1st, what is "payment in cash"? and 2d, what is "a fully paid-up share"? and I shall try to consider them distinctly and separately—observing in the outset that in the consideration of them we have no aid from section 25 of the Companies Act, or from anything except the general rules of the common law, resting I hope and believe, on reason and good sense.

And first, what is meant by the word "cash," when used as in section 25 of the statute? Speaking negatively, its meaning is not confined to "currency," that is to say, minted gold and silver, and such bank notes as are, by statute, legal tender. But if not so limited what possible guide can we have except the rules of the common law, i.e., the rules of reason and good sense, applicable to the particular case in which the question as to the meaning of the word may arise? But these rules are not confined to questions under section 25 of the Companies Act. And this suggests an observation, which I regard as one of much general practical significance, that every statute is to be construed and applied with a due reference to the rules of the common law, which it is undesirable, and indeed (fortunately) impossible that every statute should keep on repeating in case we should forget or neglect them in the particular case. My conclusion, therefore, is that the amount of any shares is to be held, or not, to have been paid in cash, by reference to the rules of the common law applicable to the facts of the individual case in which the question arises.

Second, what is "a fully paid-up share"? It is, I think, clearly a share, "the whole amount" whereof has been paid in cash. It is also, in my opinion, clear that a certificate by the proper officers of a company that certain shares are fully paid up is an acknowledgment which is prima facie binding on the company and available to the holder, that "the whole amount thereof" has been paid in cash. By the expression "prima facie" I mean to imply that such certificate may in any particular case be impeached on the ground that the company's officers were not warranted in issuing it.

It follows from what I have said that by the contract I am dealing with the purchasing company obliged themselves to deliver to the seller shares in the company, "the whole amount" of which was a certain specified sum of money sterling, and certified in the usual binding manner to have been paid, and as I assume and think paid in cash. I so assume and think because by section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, presumably known to both the contracting parties, the amount of the shares could not be effectually paid, i.e., paid at all, otherwise than in cash. But beyond this section 25 cannot affect the construction of the contract, or the meaning and intention imputable to the contracting parties. No. 206.

July 8, 1891.

Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

The contract price of the property is specified in sterling money, a fixed sum in no respect uncertain or variable. Then it is agreed that this "price" shall be paid by delivering shares of the same amount in sterling money—neither uncertain nor variable—with a formal and of course true and valid certificate that this amount has been paid. It is obviously immaterial to the argument whether the agreement was that the whole or only a certain fixed part of the contract price should be thus paid. I have, for simplicity, assumed that the whole was, and that the whole exactly corresponded with the amount of the 130 shares in question, viz., £1300, "the amount" of them being that exact sum, and incapable of variation. Now, the parties manifestly thought and assumed that the amount of the price might be set off against the amount of the shares, which being thus (by set off) paid in cash might legitimately be certified as paid accordingly. Whether or not this was a legitimate assumption is, I think, the question in the case. The statute only declares that the amount of the shares must be paid in cash. Whether a payment in cash has been operated by "set off" is a question at common law, as I have already pointed out. That it is capable of being so is not doubtful. Whether or not it has, in any particular case, depends on the facts of it, and is, I think, very plainly a question at common law.

Now it was conceded, as I understood, by the counsel for the liquidator that the price of property sold to a company may be set off against the amount of shares, so as to operate payment of the latter in cash under sec. 25 of the Companies Act, provided the contract for the sale of the property at a cash price is followed (at any interval however short) by an agreement to take payment thereof in paid-up shares, but not if such contract of sale, and such agreement as to the mode of payment, are in the same instrument—or of course merely simultaneous in the case of moveables—the sale of which requires no instrument. I must confess that I am unable to appreciate the logic or sense of the distinction. That the thing cannot be done in any way is an intelligible proposition, but that it cannot in the one way but may in the other, which does not appreciably differ from it—both being in the power and option of the parties who want to do it—is I own unintelligible to me. At common law (which in my opinion governs) we should, I think, characterise such a proposition as absurd; and if appeal is made to section 25 of the Companies Act, it does, I think, at least approach the ridiculous to suggest that the evil which that clause was intended to avoid exists when the thing is done by one instrument, but not when it is done by two, the thing itself being such as the parties were entitled to bargain for and accomplish without impediment from the statute.

It was argued on the part of the liquidator that, when the agreement to take payment of the price otherwise than in money occurs in the contract of sale, a money debt, or obligation to pay money, never exists, and that there is thus no debt (in money) due to the seller which can be set off against the money debt due by him to the buyers (the company). But is this so? I think it clear, on the contrary, that a contract of sale of land (or any commodity) at a fixed price in sterling money does of itself constitute a money debt and obligation, notwithstanding an agreement for the payment of it in a particular way. Such agreement is in its nature subsidiary. Suppose (the property being delivered and the period for paying the price arrived) that payment is not made in the manner agreed on, what is the seller's right under the contract? or has he none? I should think it clear at the common law that he has a right of action for the money price, although it may well be that he may elect, if he pleases, to sue for payment in the particular manner agreed on. Put the case that the mode of payment agreed on is that the buyer shall convey to the seller a certain house or piece of land of equal value, and fails to do so, having discovered that he cannot, or for any reason or for none does not. Is it doubtful that the seller may demand and sue for the price in money? The assumption on which this argument against the set-off rests is therefore unfounded, if the rules of the common law are to govern, and I know of no others which can be appealed to.

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.

Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

It was further urged that when the seller got the shares certified as fully paid up, although unwarrantably, they not being so in fact, he got all the price that he bargained for. But this is certainly untrue in fact, and the suggestion, if made by a private party, would be dishonest. The bargain was that the price should be paid by the delivery of shares "fully paid up" in fact, and not of shares untruly and unwarrantably certified to be so, and it cannot be reasonably or honestly represented that this was not the meaning and intention of both parties.

It was contended for the liquidator that the true import and meaning of the contract was, that the respondent should convey to the company his property, of the covenanted value of so many thousands of pounds, as a premium to induce them to give him shares, the amount of which he was to pay over and above, and it was pressed upon us that this was a quite fair and familiar sort of bargain, and might have proved profitable by a rise in the value of the shares. If this view is true in fact,—that is, if such is the true import and meaning of the contract,—any reference to section 25 of the Companies Act is idle, and we have been wearied and are wearying ourselves in vain with arguments about it. For in this view there is not and never was a contract that the amount of the shares should be paid otherwise than in cash. The registration before the shares were issued of the only contract regarding them would have been useless, for it does not relate to the payment of the amount of the shares, but only to a premium or bribe to induce the company to let the respondent have them. It would be a waste of time to dwell on a view so fanciful and untrue. Clause 25 of the Act may, or may not, defeat the intention of the parties as expressed in their written contract, but it cannot warrant a misrepresentation of it,—that is to say, the defeasance of it through the medium of misrepresentation.

It is perhaps superfluous to observe that the circumstance of the company being in liquidation does not affect the points I have been considering, which must be dealt with and decided exactly as they would have been had the company, as a solvent and going company, been demanding, and seeking to enforce, payment of calls on the shares in question. For the Companies Act, 1867, sec. 25, is applicable to the case of a solvent and going company exactly as it is to a company in liquidation.

I desire to point out the materiality, in my opinion, of the fact that the contract in question is a completely executed (in the sense of fulfilled) as distinguished from a current contract which is still wholly or partially unexecuted. When shares have been issued and registered on a contract between the shareholder and the company that the amount, necessarily a fixed sum of money, shall be paid with—say goods such as the company deals in—it may be that the company is at liberty to repudiate the contract as to the mode of payment, and, founding on sec. 25 of the Act, require payment in cash. But then they shall not have the goods. They are entitled to have payment for the shares in cash, but not in both cash and goods—that is to say, twice over. If, however, the contract has been completely executed, the goods having been received and consumed or sold by the company, and the sellers' account stated and closed in the company's books, he being debited on the one side with the money amount of the shares and credited on the other with the same sum as the admitted contract price of the goods—the two entries thus balancing each other, I have to state it as my clear opinion that the matter cannot be gone back upon, and that it would be to prostitute sec. 25 of the Act from its legitimate purpose to permit it to be founded on to the effect that the shares are to be paid for over again in money, and that the goods are not to be paid for at all. But this is the very case we are dealing with. The company got the property which they bought from the respondent years (not many, but still years) before they went into liquidation, and in the respondent's account in their books credited him on the one side with the price (the amount not being disputable or disputed), and on the other debited him with the price (or amount) of the shares which had been delivered to him. Is it doubtful that according to the rules and principles of the common law this is a clear case of legitimate set-off (not merely pleaded, but allowed and acted on), and payment thereby of admitted mutual debts?

To avoid any risk of misapprehension I desire to say that the opinion which I have formed and expressed involves no questioning of the proposition that a shareholder of a bankrupt company in liquidation is not entitled to have his name struck out of the list of contributories by reason of a debt (of whatever amount) due to him by the company, or to set off such debt against the liquidator's claim for calls. What I dissent from, as in my judgment unsound, is the very different proposition that supervening bankruptcy and liquidation will destroy or affect in any way the validity of a payment by set-off to the solvent company, which was good and effectual prior to the liquidation.

Had the company here remained a solvent and going company, it is according to the opinion which I have expressed that they could not have gone back on the implemented contract between them and the respondent, and the account stated in their books not inaccurately but in all respects truly, on the footing of set-off allowed and acted on. I am further of opinion that, if the solvent company could not have gone back on it, neither can the liquidator. The matter was settled and terminated before the bankruptcy. It will, I should think, be conceded as a generally true proposition that settlements of accounts by set-off, which are of familiar and daily occurrence in the business of companies, are not opened up by subsequent bankruptcy and liquidation. If so, the challenge of the settlement here must be on the specialty that it related to the payment of shares. But here is no other specialty than such as sec. 25 of the Companies Act may introduce, and this enactment applies, as I have pointed out, equally to solvent and going companies—so that the supervening bankruptcy, after any interval, long or short, will not affect its operation.

The question, therefore, comes back to this, could the company, had it continued solvent, have gone back on the settlement by set-off?

The views which I have expressed extend to the whole shares delivered to the respondent, and the amount of which is entered against him in the company's books, and credited as paid by the cross entry of the contract price of the property which they got from him, and I am of opinion that the case ought to be decided accordingly, although in terms and in form the order or decree must be limited to the 130 shares now standing in the respondent's name.

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.

Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

But it is my duty to notice and express my opinion on another view which was argued to us, and indeed chiefly or solely relied on by the respondent's counsel—very reasonably, if they thought it clearly the strongest—for it is sufficient to avoid the demand made in respect of the 130 shares in question. It is founded on the fact which I have not hitherto stated, that by the contract in question the company obliged themselves to pay the contract price of £12,000 to the extent of £7500 by freeing and relieving him of debts to that amount due by him to certain creditors of his, and that by subsequent agreement the respondent agreed to relieve the company of this obligation to the extent of £4000, and instead to take that amount of paid-up shares, which were accordingly delivered to him, or rather shares to that amount unwarrantably (as the liquidator contends) certified as paid up. The amount of the whole shares delivered to him was £8500, including those to the amount of £4000 just referred to. Now, the question is this—whether a distinction can be made between shares to the amount of £4000, as being given for discharging the company of their obligation to pay the respondent's debts to that amount, and the remainder (to the amount of £4500) as being given directly in part payment of the price of the property sold. It is a nice distinction certainly, and it is a pity that there should be occasion to resort to it. But the respondent's counsel sought thereby to avoid the nice, and even subtle and captious, argument against them that, unless an agreement to take payment of the price of property in paid-up shares was made subsequent (however brief the interval) to the contract to sell at that price, there could be no money debt on which to found the plea of set-off. Their contention accordingly was, that to the amount of £4000 there was certainly a money debt due by the company to the respondent, inasmuch as they had bound themselves to pay that amount to creditors of his, and having failed to do so (which they did), and so left him to pay the amount himself, they were his debtors and he their creditor to that amount in cash, and so to that amount there was a debt due by the company to him which might be set off against any debt due by him to the company.

The liquidator answered, 1st, that the company did not undertake to pay the respondent's debts to his creditors to the amount stated, but only to relieve him of these debts; and, 2d, that it was impossible to say which of the shares delivered to the respondent were in direct payment of the price of the property under the original contract, and which of them were in lieu of their obligation to pay and relieve him of his debts.

I am of opinion that if an individual (or a company) undertakes for an onerous consideration to relieve a man of debts of his to a specified amount, and fails to do so, leaving him to pay them himself, the defaulting party is debtor for the amount, and that a valid plea of set-off may be based on the debt so incurred. I am further of opinion that this company thus became the debtors of the respondent to the amount, strictly in money, of £4000. It was certainly intended that it should be paid by so many of the shares (certified as paid up) delivered to him in 1886 as would amount to £4000, and why this intention should be frustrated I fail to see. Of course this involves the assumption that a money debt of £4000 may be set off against a money debt of the like amount due for shares, although to be paid in cash. But the assumption is, I think, clearly sound.

No. 206.

July 8, 1891.

Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

Now, what has the distinguishing and identification of shares to do with the question of set-off? Take any number of shares you please, the amount of the whole of them was a certain fixed sum payable in cash to the company by the holder, and, if he was the company's creditor in a debt of £4000, he might, I should think, clearly on his part set it off, and the company on theirs take it as set off accordingly against his liability on any of the shares not exceeding that amount, and, if the shares are indistinguishable, which the liquidator here says they are, what can it signify to which of them, within the amount of the debt, the set-off shall apply? The respondent requires that it shall be applied to the 130 shares now standing in his name. Upon these shares he stands debited in the books of the solvent company with £1300 as money due by him in respect of them, while per contra he is credited with the debt of £4000 due to him by the company. I mean of course that this is the result of an intelligent reading of the entries. There were other entries, but it was manifestly immaterial to the company which of the cross entries should be set off against each other. Has the liquidator on behalf of the creditors any legitimate interest to oppose the respondent's choice? None that I can see, unless indeed he can reasonably say that he is apprehensive of the benefit of the whole or part of this set-off being claimed by the present holders of other shares assigned to them by the respondent. No suggestion to that effect has been or can, I think, reasonably be made, and I should be greatly indisposed to listen to a mere fanciful suggestion in order to do what I should regard as injustice.

I am of opinion with respect to all the shares here in question, registered in the respondent's name, that they are fully paid up, and therefore that the respondent ought not to be entered in the list of contributories in respect of them.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred with the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD TRAYNER.—The liquidators of this company propose to place Mr Law's name on the list of contributories as the holder of 150 shares. Mr Law objects to this on the ground that his shares are all fully paid up, and that he is under no liability for calls or otherwise in respect thereof. Of the 150 shares twenty are held by him under transfer, the remainder under original allotment, but this difference in the title under which the shares are held makes no difference in the question of liability, having regard to the admitted facts of this case.

The company now in liquidation was formed for the purpose of taking over the Coustonholm Paper Mills then belonging to Mr Law, and of carrying on the business then and there carried on by him. By agreement, dated 8th and 11th January 1886, entered into between Mr Law and one of the promoters of the company, Mr Law sold the mills, with the plant, machinery, and whole pertinents, for the price of £12,000, which was to be payable as follows:—£4500 in fully paid-up shares, and the balance, £7500, by the company freeing and relieving him of his liability for the bonds, obligations, and securities for which he was then liable "in relation to said business." In consequence, as was explained at the bar, of the shares of the company not being taken up by the public as had been expected, the agreement above referred to was modified at a meeting of the directors of the company (so called, although the company was not yet registered), held on 24th March 1886, at which Mr Law was present. The minute of that meeting bears that "it was further agreed, in respect the price of the mills amounting to £12,000, less amount of bonds, say £3500,

No. 206.
July 8, 1891.
Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

will amount to £8500, Mr Law has consented to accept of the entire sum of £8500 in fully paid-up shares of the company." Mr Law admits that he acquiesced in the arrangement thus made, and signed the minute of the meeting in token of his acquiescence. It is made a question now whether Mr Law's contract with the company is that expressed in the minute of 24th March or that expressed in the formal agreement of January. It does not appear to me to affect the result, whether the contract is to be taken as set forth in the one document or the other. Both agreements are the same in character, for by both and each of them Mr Law agreed to convey his property to the company in return for a certain number of shares and for relief from certain obligations. The number of shares and the amount of obligation from which relief is to be given differ, but that is not material to the question before us. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the agreement made in March "constituted an entire novation of the agreement of January," and therefore that the agreement of March is that which must be taken as regulating the rights and obligations of the parties. In that view, and having regard to the admitted facts of this case, and the law applicable thereto, I cannot see how Mr Law can successfully maintain that his name should not be placed on the list of contributories.

By the 25th section of the Companies Act of 1867, it is provided that every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar at or before the issue of such shares. Now, under this statutory provision, there are only two modes in which a person holding shares in a company can escape from the position of a contributory in its liquidation. Either he must have paid for his shares in cash, or have registered, at or before the time when such shares were issued, a contract "duly made in writing," which determines that the shares are not to be paid for in cash. Mr Law cannot plead the latter of these grounds; for, assuming that the minute of 24th March may be regarded as such a contract as would fulfil the statutory description (whether it would or not I do not say), it was never filed with the Registrar. Nor can Mr Law plead the other ground of exemption from liability, because he has not paid "in cash" for his shares. It is said, however, that he must be dealt with as if he had paid cash, because he gave property in return for the shares. But this argument fails, I think, on the authority of the cases decided in England, to which we have been referred, and in which decisions I concur. The effect of these decisions is this,—if the person to whom shares are issued has a money claim against the company, that money claim may be set off as cash paid against the shares, it not being necessary in order to satisfy the provisions of the statute that the money claim should be paid in cash to the shareholder and handed back by him in cash as payment of the shares. The mere passing of money from hand to hand is not necessary, but it must be a money claim exigible from the company which is set off against the cash due for the shares. Now, Mr Law had and has no money claim against the company. He sold, or rather he bartered, his property for a certain number of shares and relief from a certain obligation. I leave the latter element out of view, because the relief stipulated for has been given. That he had no claim against the company for money may be shewn in this way. If he was now in an action for enforcing his rights against the company, what could he claim? Not money, because the company, offering him shares to the amount specified, would fulfil its obligation; and, on the other hand, if the company had been successful and the shares had risen in value, Mr Law could have declined payment of £8500 in money if offered to him, and have insisted on delivery of 850 shares. Shares therefore, and not money, was what Mr Law was entitled, and alone entitled, to demand,—shares, and shares only, the company was bound to give. It follows that if Mr Law had no money claim against the company, he had no claim which he could set off against his liability for "the whole amount" of the shares allotted to him; and if he could not plead set-off, and has not paid cash "to the whole amount" of his shares, his liability therefor continues.

No. 206.
July 8, 1891.
Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

It is said, however, that what Mr Law stipulated for was fully paid-up shares, and that if his shares are fully paid up no liability attaches to them; if they are not, then Mr Law is now entitled to demand the price of his property, and set off that price against liability as a contributory. It is not open to doubt, I think, that the shares held by Mr Law are not fully paid up, free from all further liability. Whatever these shares might be held to be in a question with the company, if it was solvent, they cannot be regarded as fully paid up in the liquidation. The amount of the shares has not been paid in cash, and Mr Law has failed to take that step pointed out by statute whereby he could have given these shares the character and privileges of paid-up shares. If,—not being paid-up shares,—Mr Law is still a creditor for the price of his property, he may have a claim against the company's estate, but to hold him entitled now to set off that claim against his liability as a shareholder would be to give him a preference over the other creditors of the company. Further, compensation, or set off against liability as a contributory, cannot be pleaded in a liquidation.

I have said that in my opinion the agreement made in March 1886 is that which must be taken as regulating the rights of parties. Would the result in this case be different if that agreement was set aside and the agreement of January substituted? I think not. Under it there was no obligation on the company to pay Mr Law any money. The company did, however, thereby undertake to relieve him of certain money obligations. It is pleaded that part of the shares allotted to Mr Law were allotted that he might fulfil the company's obligation of relief, and that, being so allotted against an existing money obligation, no claim can now be made in respect of these shares, on the principle of the decided cases I have already referred to. Without expressing either assent to or dissent from this view, I am of opinion that Mr Law cannot take any benefit from it. He has not shewn, and cannot shew, that the shares now held by him are shares which were issued by the company under their obligation to relieve rather than under their obligation to deliver shares.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking this a hard case for Mr Law. He has parted with his property for no valuable consideration, and the consideration which he did get has only, as it turns out, imposed upon him an additional liability. It might of course have been otherwise. The shares allotted to him might have proved very valuable, and he doubtless thought they would. But it would be incorrect, in my view, to say that Mr Law got nothing for his property. He got exactly what he bargained for, and all that can be said is that, as matters have turned out, he made a bad bargain. He could have protected himself by a simple enough measure pointed out by the statute, and having failed to do so, must now contribute to the payment of those creditors whose debts might never have been incurred had they known that the greater part, or at all events a great part, of the capital of the company was represented by paid-up shares held by one of the shareholders.

No. 206. July 8, 1891. Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law.

THE COURT adhered.

CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—T. F. WEIR & ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 207. July 9, 1891. Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

DUKE OF ARGYLL, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Asher—Johnston—Macphail.
A. A. LOCHNELL CAMPBELL, Defender (Respondent).—D.-F. Balfour—Dickson—Forsyth.

Salmon-fishings—Property—Title—Barony—Cruive.—In an action brought in 1889 by the Duke of Argyll for declarator that he had right to salmon-fishings in the River Awe ex adverso of the lands of E. on the south or left bank of the river, with the exception of certain pools, the pursuer founded on a crown charter of novodamus of 1667 which contained a grant of the barony of Lochow with the salmon-fishings. The lands of E. formed part of the barony of Lochow, and had been feued to the defender's authors under reservation of the fishings in the Awe.

It was not disputed that the defender had had possession of the salmon-fishings in question for upwards of forty years.

The defender pleaded that the pursuer had no title to sue, and, on the merits, founded on a crown charter of confirmation of 1727, conveying to a predecessor the barony of Kilmaronaig, described as "comprehending," inter alia, the lands of Ardchonnel "cum salmonum piscatione aquae de Awe vizt. tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Polindownan et Polinstuck, et tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Cruback, et tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Sanluip jacen in aqua et ore ejusdem cum omnibus earundem privilegiis et pertinen, atqe. (lie) cruives super dictam aquam de Awe." It appeared from the charter of erection of the barony of Kilmaronaig that the lands of Ardchonnel and the Awe fishings attached thereto were not included in the barony; Kilmaronaig and Ardchonnel were both distant from the River Awe.

The defender maintained that the charter of 1727 and infeftments following thereon were a sufficient title to which to ascribe his possession (1) as a title to the barony of Kilmaronaig, including Ardchonnel, with its salmon-fishings in the Awe; (2) as a title to a barony; (3) as a title to the lands of Ardchonnel, with salmon-fishings in the Awe.

Held (1st) (diss. Lord Young) that the pursuer's charter of novodamus of 1667 was a valid grant of the barony of Lochow with the salmon-fishings thereof, and by implication included salmon-fishings in the Awe, where it adjoined the lands of the barony, up to the medium filum of the river; (2d) that the defender had no title to which his possession of the salmon-fishings could be ascribed, in respect (1) that the defender's crown charter of confirmation of 1727, being merely a charter by progress, did not incorporate the lands of Ardchonnel and the fishings in the Awe with the barony of Kilmaronaig, so as to give the defender a barony title to salmon-fishings in the Awe; (2) that the defender's title to the barony of Kilmaronaig could not be connected with his possession of salmon-fishings at a distance from it; and (3) that the defender's title to the lands of Ardchonnel with the salmon-fishings specified could not be construed by possession into a general grant of salmon-fishings, but was limited to the pools and cruives mentioned.

Lord Young was of opinion that a grant of barony with salmon-fishings did not imply a grant of salmon-fishings in all waters adjoining the lands of the barony, but that it was a question of fact what salmon-fishings belonged to the barony, and that in the present case the adverse possession of the salmon-fishings in question by another for more than the prescriptive period was sufficient to shew that they did not belong to the barony of Lochow, and therefore that the pursuer had no title to sue.

No. 207.
July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.
2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.
M.

IN 1889 the Duke of Argyll raised an action against Archibald Argyll Lochnell Campbell, of Lochnell, for declarator that the pursuer had right to the whole salmon-fishings in the River Awe (with certain exceptions) from the march between the defender's lands of Eachterachine and the lands of Fanans (belonging to the representatives of the late Mr Campbell of Monzie) westwards to the mouth of the Awe, and particularly to the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the defender's lands of Eachterachine on the south or left bank of the river, as marked in an Ordnance map produced with the summons—but always reserving to the defender the salmon-draughts of Poulindounan and Polinstuck, and salmon-draught of Cruback, and salmon-draught of Sanluip. The fishings claimed extended about a mile and a-half along the river.

The pursuer was proprietor of the barony of Lochow and of the barony of Lorne. Lochow was bounded on the north or north-east by the Awe, and Lorne was (in part) bounded by the Awe on the south and south-west. He stated that Eachterachine was formerly part of the barony of Lochow, and that the salmon-fishings thereof were still part of that barony, the lands having been given off under reservation of the salmon-fishings.

It was not disputed that, at least since 1846, the defender had by his tenants possessed the fishings in question. The pursuer, however, averred that the defender had no title to which possession could be attributed.

The following was the position of the titles of the parties so far as necessary to be here set forth.

The earliest charter of Lochow was granted by King Robert I. to Colin Campbell, the pursuer's ancestor, in 1315. It erected Lochow into a barony. There was no mention of fishings. A charter of Lochow of 1407 by the Duke of Albany, Governor of Scotland, bore to be cum piscationibus. A crown charter of 1540 by James V. granted the barony and other lands "cum piscariis in aquis dulcibus et salsis," as did certain subsequent early charters. The earliest crown title, however, in which salmon-fishings were expressly granted was a charter by Charles II. in favour of the Earl of Argyll, dated 15th October 1667. This was a charter of confirmation and novodamus, bearing to confirm and grant of new to the grantee the barony of Lochow and other baronies, including the baronies of Over Cowal, and Otterinverane and others, as well as of Lochow and Lorne. At the end of the description were the words "cum castris, turribus . . . . lacubus, piscationibus salmonum aliorumque piscium . . . omnibus aliis partibus pendiculis et pertinentibus terrarum, baroniarum, aliorumque prædict." But the defenders contended that this clause was limited to the baronies of Over Cowal and Otterinverane.*

* The description of the lands in the clause of novodamus was as follows,—'Omnes et singulas dictas terras et Baroniam de Lochow una cum advocatione, donatione et jure patronatus eccliarum parochialium et parochiarum Sti. Petri Deaconi de Lochow et Inschael rectoriarum et vicariarum earund. dict. tras de Ardskeodneis, Glenyra, Glenshera, et Letter dict. Burgum de Innerraray infra dict. Baroniam dict. terras et Baroniam de Glenurquhy, totas et integras dict. terras et dominium de Cowall cum dta. Forresta de Benmoir eidem pertinen. et spectan. cum oibus et singulis manerierum locis molendinis silvis forrestis lie heillings, grassinges piscationibus decimis advocationibus donationibus et juribus patronatuum eccliarum beneficiorum, capellaniarum et altaragiorum domibus edificiis hortis toftis croftis partibus pendiculis et integris pertinen. earund. quibuscunq. dtas. tras et Baroniam de Over Cowall dict. tras de Straquhir extenden ad quadraginta unam mercatam et dimidium mercat. trarum antiqui extentus dictas tras de Stratheichie, Glenmassen, Glenlean, Lochstrivan Scheid, Ardinslat Cowart, Fleyming, Innerneill et Glack, Camisse et Achatachevane Dtas. tras. de Ardmernoche Lynsage Darinagerochmoir Glenlair et Darinagerochbeg dict. terras

No. 207.

July 9, 1891. Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

The pursuer was duly infeft in the baronies of Lochow, Lorne, and others belonging to him.

The pursuer, though he had not possessed the fishings in dispute, had possessed the salmon-fishings in other parts of the barony of Lochow. This possession was, as stated by the Lord Ordinary, after a proof, of the following nature:—"(1) Salmon-fishing exercised at and near Inverary by the pursuer and his authors; (2) salmon-fishing partly by net and coble, and partly by rod, at various points in Lochawe, by vassals of the pursuer holding parts of the barony of Lochow; (3) salmon-fishing in the River Orchy and at the head of Lochawe, and of the River Awe, also by vassals of the barony of Lochow."

From the defender's title it appeared that in 1529 the pursuer's author, Colin, third Earl of Argyll, made a grant of certain lands in the barony of Lochow to Sir John Campbell, of Calder, among which was the 11½ merk land of Eachterachine. In 1673 this grant was confirmed in favour of Sir Hugh Campbell, of Calder, by the Earl of Argyll, "salva tamen et reservata nobis, heredibus et successoribus nostris, totali piscatura aquæ de Aw cum pertinentibus."

These subjects passed from the Campbells of Calder to the Campbells of Lochnell, the defender's predecessors, and the latest charter containing, inter alia, the lands of Eachterachine, and with the reservation first quoted, was a precept of clare constat, granted by the pursuer in favour of Duncan Campbell, of Lochnell, on 12th November 1855.

The defender, while admitting that he was proprietor of lands named in the titles Eachterachine, denied that these were the lands described in the summons, and stated that his lands of Eachterachine did not come down to the River Awe, but were separated from it by other lands belonging to him, and forming part of his estate of Lochnell.

Further, the defender averred that the whole fishings on the River Awe ex adverso of the lands described in the summons fell within his other titles. He founded upon a crown charter of confirmation, dated 26th July 1727, granted in favour of Sir Duncan Campbell, of Lochnell, and Colin Campbell, his son. By that charter there was disposed and confirmed to them:—"Totas et Integras Terras Baroniam, Balivatum et Regalitatem de Kilmachronag alias vocat Muckairn, comprehenden," inter alia, "Totas et Integras illas septem mercat terrarum decem mercat terrarum antiqui extentus de Ardchonniell vulgo nuncupat Ardchonniell Caillen cum salmonum piscatione aquae de Awe vizt. tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Polindownan et Polinstuck, et tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Cruback, et tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Sanluip jacen in aqua et ore ejusdem cum omnibus earundem privilegiis et pertinen, atqe. (lie) cruives super dictam aquam de Awe, omnes extenden et Baroniam de Otterinverane dtas. tras. de Glasserie et Ederlin supra et subscripta vizt. dtas. terras de Menard Kilmichaelbeg Gorthinrenoch Knok duas Ardchastells Gallinich Auchinbreck Ballemoir Kilmchell Rozenaw Monearinach Knokalloway Feorling Tungue Garvalt Craignewer Thangannelech Barquheill Torblairain Lagg Auchatahearlich Craigmurthill totas et integras tras. de Craignish et Melphoirt cum castris turribus fortaliciis manerierum locis domibus edificiis hortis pomariis molendinis tris molendinariis multuris silvis forrestis lie Banks parcis pratis insulis lacubus piscationibus salmonum aliorumq. piscium tenen. tenan. libere tenen. servitiis advocationibus donationibus et juribus patronatuum ecclarum parochialium et parochiarum de Kilmairtein et Kilmahew seu Inneraray Kilmorich Dysart Lochguoylshead Kilmelphort et Kilmorew rectoriarum et vicariarum earund. et onim aliarum eccliarum beneficiorum et capellaniarum annexis connexis dependen omibus aliis partibus pendiculis et pertinen trarum Baroniarum aliorumq. predict oia jacen infra dict vicetum. de Argyll," &c.

---

No. 207.

July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

ut praefertur et jacen in Baronia de Ardchattan Dominio de Lorn et Vicecomitatu antedict. Una etiam cum officiis et privilegiis liberae Regalitatis Justiciariae et Balivatus omnium praedict. terrarum et terrarum de Muckairn aliorumque terrarum particulariter supramentionat cum molendinis piscationibus, insulis et omnibus earundem pertinen jacen infra omnes bondas hujusmodi cum omnibus feodis commoditatibus, libertatibus privilegiis praeheminentiis, honoribus dignitatibus, immunitatibus et jurisdictionibus quibuscunque ad dict officia pertinen . . . Omnes ab antiquo in unam liberam Baroniam Baroniam de Kilmachronag nuncupand unit. et erect. per illustrissimum Principem Jacobum sextum Scotiae Angliae et Hiberniae Regem fedeiq. Defensorem beatae memoriae virtute cartae et infeofamenti sub magno suo sigillo desuper concess. de data 1st April 1603 in favorem quondam Domini Joannis Campbell de Calder."

The deed set forth a reddendo for Muckairn and Ardchattan, and a separate reddendo for Ardchonnel, and another "pro dict piscatione et tractationibus salmonum dict aquae de Awe."

The charter of 1603 referred to erected into the barony of Kilmacronaig the lands of Muckairn and Ardchattan, but made no mention of the lands of Ardchonell, or of the fishings described in the charter of 1727 as above quoted, and the reddendo for Muckairn and Ardchattan was that specified on these lands in the charter of 1727.

The lands of Ardconnel were ten miles distant from the Awe.

The defender was infeft under titles deduced from this crown charter of 1727. There had been no cruive fishing within living memory, and there was no satisfactory evidence as to the cruives mentioned in the charter. The defender maintained upon the evidence that it was proved that a cruive near the march of Fanans had been erected by one of the Campbells of Lochnell, his predecessor, and in point of fact there were remains of a cruive to be seen. The Court were, however, of opinion on the balance of evidence that these were the remains of a cruive erected about 1760 by the Lorne Furnace Company, a smelting company which had at that time from one of the defender's predecessors a lease of a tract of ground near the Awe at that point, and that it had been abandoned by the company in consequence of objection taken by the other proprietors.

With regard to the possession of the fishings in dispute it was proved, as already mentioned, that from 1846 onwards the defender and his author had, through tenants, possessed them by rod and line fishings. It was also proved that such possession was the most practicable and advantageous. With regard to the earlier possession of the fishings there was documentary evidence applicable to about thirty-five years of the period between 1768 and 1810 in the shape of certain leases to which the predecessors of the defender were parties as well as other proprietors on the Awe. It having been found more profitable that the fishings on this part of the Awe should be let jointly these proprietors executed joint leases, and in these the defender's predecessor, Duncan Campbell, of Lochnell, described his fishings as "All and Haill the said Duncan Campbell's fishings upon the water of Awe consisting of the following pools, viz.:—Trubag, Polinstuck and Pollandinan, with the still net fishings upon Ocheity, near the mouth of the said water, commonly called Sheanluib."

On 19th November 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has failed to instruct that he has any title to the salmon-fishings in dispute: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is whether certain salmon-fishings in

No. 207.
July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that the Duke of Argyll had no title to sue. It was true that the River Awe, opposite a part of the defender's estate of Lochnell, belong to that estate, or, on the other hand, belong to the pursuer, the Duke of Argyll, as part of his barony of Lochow. It is not disputed that the fishings in question have been possessed by Lochnell for more than forty years,—that is to say, it is admitted that since about 1846 the Lochnell tenants have had continuous possession by rod-fishing, and that in the circumstances such possession is sufficient. But the pursuer maintains that the lands opposite which the fishings are situated are certain lands held of him as superior, and parts of his barony of Lochow; that those lands were given off at an early period to the defenders' authors under express reservation of fishings; that the fishings thus reserved include the fishings in question, and that these fishings are accordingly still part of the barony, the defenders having no title thereto, either sufficient by itself, or sufficient as a basis for prescription.

"I may say at once that I think the pursuer has sufficiently proved (1) that the lands opposite which the fishings in dispute are situated are the lands of Eachterachine, feued off by the pursuer's authors to the defender's authors in the year 1529; (2) that these lands formed and form part of the pursuer's ancient barony of Lochow; (3) that they were given off to the defender's authors under express reservation of fishings; and (4) that the pursuer, while he has no express grant of salmon-fishing attached to his barony of Lochow (or at least no grant contained in any original charter or charter of novodamus*), has yet, in virtue of his barony title, possessed by himself and his vassals various salmon-fishings in various parts of the barony for at least the prescriptive period.

"The questions which remain and on which the case turns are (1) how far the pursuer's possession under his barony title applies or can be made to cover the fishings in dispute? (2) how far, in the absence of such possession, the pursuer has a title to challenge the defenders' title? and (3) how far, apart from their Eachterachine title, the defender has a title to fishings comprising or capable of comprising the fishings in dispute.

"1. It is clear that the pursuer's title requires proof of possession. The original charters of the barony of Lochow do not contain any grant of salmon-fishings, and although the charter of 1667 and subsequent charters do include such grant in general terms, these are all charters by progress, and, apart from possession, have no force. Possession therefore is, as I have said, necessary, and that being so, the first observation is that there has certainly been no possession—I mean by the pursuer and his authors—of the particular fishings in dispute. On the contrary, it is common ground that these fishings have for the prescriptive period (and presumably therefore all along) been possessed by the defender, whose possession (as he holds no grant from the pursuer) is necessarily adverse possession. The possession therefore on which the pursuer relies must be not actual but constructive possession, and constructive possession sufficient in some way to override the actual possession of the defender. Now, what is the possession of this sort on which the pursuer relies? It seems to be threefold—(1) salmon-fishing exercised at and near Inveraray by the pursuer and his authors; (2) salmon-fishing partly by net and coble, and partly by rod, at various points in Lochawe, by vassals of the pursuer holding parts of the barony of Lochow; (3) salmon-fishing in the River Orchy and at the head of Lochawe, and of the River Awe, also by vassals of the barony of Lochow.

"Now, it does not appear to me to be possible to hold that possession of those salmon-fishings—all of them discontiguous to and some of them remote from the fishings in dispute—can on any principle of construction be held as possession of the fishings in dispute. The argument of the pursuer was that the salmon-fishings of the barony of Lochow are a unum quid, and therefore that possession of a part must be held as possession of the whole. But, as pointed out in the case of Cathcart, May 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 744, and elsewhere, the question his earlier charters did not contain an express right to salmon-fishings. The original grant of Lochow in 1315 did not mention fishings. The always is, what are the salmon-fishings of the barony? Do they, or do they not, include the particular salmon-fishings in controversy? And that depending on the proof of possession, it is a petitio principii to establish the possession by assuming that the particular fishings are part of the salmon-fishings of the barony. It is true that a grant of lands with fishing prima facie conveys the whole fishings within the boundaries of the lands. But whether and how far fishings include salmon-fishings depends, and must depend, on the extent to which salmon-fishings have been possessed. There is no presumption that because the salmon-fishings, e.g., of one river, are shewn by possession to have been within the grant, therefore the grant includes the salmon-fishings, e.g., of some different river. As expressed by Lord Deas in the case of Cathcart, the pursuer in a case like the present is really in the same position as if his charter had borne 'with salmon-fishings so far as possessed.'

* The Lord Ordinary's attention had not been called to the clause of novodamus in the crown charter of 1667.

"Indeed the case of Cathcart appears to foreclose this question, and it did not appear to me that the pursuer's counsel was able to draw any substantial distinction between that case and the present. The only distinction which I can see is one unfavourable to the pursuer, viz., that in Cathcart's case there was no element of adverse possession, while here, as already mentioned, there certainly is.

"2. I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuer has failed to shew that he has any title to the salmon-fishings in dispute, and that being so, I am further of opinion that he has no title to challenge the defender's possession or to examine the defender's title. The only ground on which the contrary was maintained was this, that he (the pursuer) being the defender's superior in the lands within which the salmon-fishings in dispute are situated, and having given off those lands reserving the fishings, the defenders are disabled from asserting against him any right of fishing, or of challenging his title to the fishings reserved. I do not think this argument sound. It may be doubted whether the reservation in question applied to salmon-fishing at all. But assuming that it did, I cannot read it as amounting to a contract that the defender should acknowledge the pursuer's right to the fishings reserved. At the utmost it only I think implied this, that the defender should not found as against the pursuer on any title derived from him, and that the defender does not do. He takes his stand, so far as the argument has yet gone, on this, that if the right is not in him (the defender) it is in the Crown, and that the Crown not molesting him, the pursuer has no title and no interest to do so.

"3. But this brings me to the third and remaining question, viz., have the defenders a title of their own? They maintain that they have. They say that, together apart from their title to the lands of Eachterachine, they have a separate and express title to these salmon-fishings, and this they say they have in the shape of a grant from the Crown of certain lands known as Ardchonnell Ardchonnell-Callen, situated on Loch Etive,—'Cum salmonum piscatione quæ de Awe, viz., tractus lie draughts salmonum de Polindowan et Polenstuick tractus lie draughts salmonum de Cruback et tractus lie draughts salmonum unluip jacen. in aqua et ore ejusd. cum omnibus earund. privilegiis et pertinen. que lie cruives super dict. aquam de Awe omnes extenden. ut prædicitur et een. in Baronia de Archattan dominio de Lorn et vicecomitatu antedict.'

"The charters on which the defenders thus found are, it is right to say, charters by progress, the separate title referred to having been derived by the proprietors of Lochnell through the Priors of Ardchattan; but as the defenders have had prescriptive possession of the fishings in dispute, and the only question whether they have a title on which to prescribe, the absence of the original grant does not appear to be material. The same remark applies to the absence of the titles prior to that of 1727 of any mention of 'cruives,' a circumstance on which the pursuer's counsel a good deal commented.

"The question, however, is whether this title to salmon-fishings covers the portion of the river now in dispute, or is, on the other hand, confined to the pools or draughts mentioned, which are quite well identified, and are situated at

No. 207.

July 9, 1891. Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

charter from Robert, Duke of Albany, in 1407 only gave the barony of Lochow and others cum piscationibus, and even the charter of 1540 only granted the extended barony of Lochow cum piscariis in aquis dulcibus et salsis. But apart from the fact that in these times such grants were no doubt intended to carry salmon-fishings, the proof shewed that the pursuer's authors, whose only right to salmon-fishings was what these charters granted to vassals and themselves, enjoyed salmon-fishings in different parts of the barony of Lochow. Besides, the crown charter of novodamus of 1667 expressly gave to Archibald, Earl of Argyll, the barony of Lochow and others cum piscatione salmonum aliorumque piscium, and it was immaterial whether this was looked on as merely interpreting the old non-express grants, and giving them full expression in the language of 17th century conveyancing, or as giving de novo a right to salmon-fishings. Now, the defender's own title shewed that the barony of Lochow went down to the River Awe, otherwise he would have no title to the lands belonging to him ex adverso of the river. The proof also shewed that the Awe divided the baronies of Lochow and Lorne, so that there was a presumption that each extended to the medium filum. Accordingly, the fishings in dispute—the fishings ex adverso of the lands of Eachterachine—must be held to be included within the express grant to Archibald, Earl of Argyll, in 1667. It was admitted that the pursuer himself had not possessed the fishings in dispute. The reservation in the defender's titles to Eachterachine—salva tamen et reservata nobis hæredibus et successoribus nostris totali piscatura aquæ de Awe cum pertin.—shewed, however, that for centuries a right in these fishings had continued to be asserted by the pursuer's predecessors, with the knowledge and assent of the defender's authors. And, moreover, the barony of Lochow must be regarded as a unum quid, and the possession of salmon-fishings generally within its limits held to cover the particular fishings now in or near the mouth of the river, where it issues into Loch Etive. The defenders say that the grant, at its date, covered the whole water of Awe, and, according to the modes of fishing then practised, was exhaustive,—the lower water being assumed to be fished by net and coble, and the upper water—that in question—where net-fishing was impracticable—being fished by cruives. They say further that, while there is not evidence of cruive-fishing on their side of the river—at least in recent times—there is evidence of the existence in the last century of a cruive at their upper march, which they claim as a cruive used by their authors in virtue of the grant of cruives referred to. The pursuer, on the other hand, denies that there is any evidence of cruive-fishing by the defenders or their authors, and he maintains that the grant of salmon-fishing is limited to the pools mentioned, and that in the absence of proof of possession by cruives, the grant of cruive-fishing cannot extend the right, or at all events support a general right, of salmon-fishing over the area claimed.

---

"In the view I have expressed as to the pursuer's title, it is not necessary that I should decide the question thus raised; but as it was anxiously argued on both sides, I think it right to say that the inclination of my opinion is with the defenders. I incline to think that a grant in general terms of salmon-fishing over a river (or at all events over a river like the Awe), followed by an enumeration of specified salmon-draughts and unspecified cruives, is at least a sufficient title on which to prescribe if necessary the whole salmon-fishings of the river. In other words, I have not, so far as I have been able to consider the matter, seen any sufficient reason why a proprietor having a grant of cruives on which he is seeking to prescribe, may not, without prejudicing his title, supersede the cruives in favour of a more profitable mode of possession, viz., rod-fishing. As I have said, however, it is not necessary to decide this point. My judgment is for the defenders on the ground that the pursuer has failed to shew that he (the pursuer) has any title to the salmon-fishings in dispute."

No. 207.
July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

dispute. This was not inconsistent with the decision in the Lord Advocate v. Cathcart, 9 Macph. 749, or the interpretation put thereon by Lord Blackburn in the Lovat case.[1]

Then came the question whether the defender had a preferable title. It was admitted that he and his authors had possessed the fishings in dispute for over forty years, not by net and coble, but by rod and line, a method which might, however, be held sufficient in a river like the Awe. But all this possession had been without a habile title on which prescription could run. He could take no benefit from his title to the lands of Eachterachine, for in it the fishings were reserved. Nor did his separate title to the salmon-draughts help him. Neither the lands of Ardconnel Cailen nor the draughts really formed part of the barony of Kilmaronaig. The charter erecting Kilmaronaig and other lands into a barony in 1603 shewed quite clearly of what that barony was composed. Campbell, of Calder, in whose favour that charter was granted, no doubt owned the draughts at the time, but on a separate title. They did not form part of the original barony, and had never been validly incorporated with it. His own titles shewed that a separate reddendo was still paid for Ardconnel Cailen and for the draughts in addition to that paid for the barony. It was accordingly not a question of prescribing on a barony title. The defender had no barony which touched the Awe at any point, and no barony title which gave him any rights in that river. What he had was a title to certain salmon-draughts mentioned by name and described as in Lorne, not in Lochow, and to nothing more. That this was the view of the defender's authors for a long period of time was clear from the series of leases covering the period from 1768 to 1809, whereby they and the other proprietors of Awe fishings let these to certain tenants. The fishings of each proprietor were let by name, and Campbell of Lochnell's were specially described as consisting of certain pools, the four draughts mentioned by name. Thus, up to 1809 at all events, no claim was made by the Campbells of Lochnell of the kind now put forward. Not merely was the title to the draughts not a habile one on which to prescribe the rest of the fishings in the river, being in reality a bounding title, but such possession as had been had of the rod-fishing was not referable to this title at all, and it was not enough that there be a barony title and possession. These things must be connected.[2]

The defender, however, maintained next that the grant of cruives in his titles gave him by implication the rod-fishings now in dispute. There was no ground for this contention. In the first place he had no valid grant of cruives. The words atque (lie) cruives on which he founded were not in the Calder titles. They appeared first in the charter of 1727 to Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochnell, and that was not a novodamus, only a charter by progress. And there was no evidence that the alleged grant was ever acted on. There probably was an old cruive on the Awe at the Fanans march, but it was not referred to in the leases which let All and Whole the Lochnell fishing, either by way of inclusion or reservation, though the Inverawe cruive or chest-fishing is expressly reserved. And the proof shewed that it was put up by persons who had no right to do so, and was soon discontinued in consequence of complaints as to its illegality. It was not law that a grant of cruives necessarily included all

[1] Lord Advocate v. Lord Lovat, July 12, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 165.

[2] Lord Advocate v. Hunt, Jan. 31, 1865, 3 Macph. 426, 37 Scot. Jur. 213, revd. Feb. 11, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 1, 39 Scot. Jur. 248; Lovat case, supra; Christison v. Hope, Nov. 18, 1847, 10 D. 119, 20 Scot. Jur. 29; Duke of Richmond v. Earl of Seafield, Feb. 16, 1870, 8 Macph. 530, 42 Scot. Jur. 246.

No. 207.
July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

other kinds of fishing.[1] Where cruives had not been granted they remained in the Crown, although it might have entirely divested itself of all rights of net and rod-fishing. And it would seem from Grant v. Duke of Gordon that it was competent for the Crown to grant cruives to B in water of which it has already granted the whole net and rod-fishings to A. But whether this were so or not the law enunciated by Lord Blackburn in the Lovat case[2] applied here. A grant of cruives give a right to fish with that method at a particular spot or spots, not necessarily anything more.

Argued for the defender;—There was no difference, as was supposed on the other side, between the charter of 1603 and that of 1727. What was granted by the former might not now be capable of being exactly identified in all its details, but the charter of 1727 gave a fuller and more accurate description and enumeration. The defender was owner of a barony. His possession of salmon-fishings was undisputed. The possession should be ascribed to the barony title. There was no sufficient indication that it could not be so. With regard to the pursuer's own title, he ascribed his right to his charter of 1667. That was not an original gift, but a novodamus. In any question of doubt it should be construed as giving no more than the original title.[3] Its construction was fully satisfied by applying the grant of salmon-fishings to the baronies of Over Cowal and Otterinverane. Possession by the Duke at one part of his barony of Lochow, even assuming that barony to come down to the Awe—which it did not—was not equivalent to possession of all. Even if prima facie on the titles the pursuer had right to the fishings the question was set at rest by the possession.[4] The admitted adverse possession could not in the state of the titles be overcome, and the pursuer had no right to criticise the defenders' title.

At advising,—

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—The pursuer is infeft under a crown charter in the lands and barony of Lochow with the salmon-fishings. The earliest crown title in which salmon-fishings are given out is a charter of confirmation and novodamus granted by Charles II. on 15th October 1667. In the previous titles the lands are granted with fishings only. For some reason it was not brought under the notice of the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer had a crown title to salmon-fishings, and in consequence his judgment has been pronounced under a misconception.

The charter of 1667 is of course a charter of progress, and is in form a renewal of existing rights. But it may be explanatory of them, and in this case I so read it. It defines the fishings which had been previously given out as being salmon-fishings. Nor was this unmeaning, for under the older law it was doubtful whether an express grant was necessary to give a good title to salmon-fishings, and if the Crown meant to recognise that such a right had been conferred by the previous titles this could be conveniently and competently done by introducing an express grant into the charter of novodamus.

---

[1] Heritors of Don, 1665, M. 10,840; Halkerton, 1769, M. 14,293; Grant v. Duke of Gordon, 1778, M. 14,297.

[2] July 12, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 163.

[3] Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross, Oct. 30, 1874, 2 R. 48; Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby D'Eresby's Trustees, March 9, 1875, 2 R. 538, aff. Dec. 13, 1877, 5 R. (H. L.) 26.

[4] Duke of Richmond v. Earl of Seafield, Feb. 16, 1870, 8 Macph. 530, Lord Cowan, at p. 542, 42 Scot. Jur. 246; Earl of Zetland v. Tennant's Trustees, Feb. 26, 1873, 11 Macph. 469, 45 Scot. Jur. 311.

No. 207.
July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

But apart from these considerations the charter gives a good title to whatever it expressly conveys. The Crown might challenge it on the ground that the estate of the vassal had been unduly enlarged. But I do not think that the challenge is open to any other. It is true that a charter of novodamus, wherever doubt exists, will be construed as commensurate with the previous title. But when the words are clear they must receive effect according to their terms so long as the charter stands unreduced.

It was urged that according to the true construction of the charter of 1667 the grant of salmon-fishings was limited to the baronies of Over Cowal and Otterinverane. I cannot so read the charter. Several lands and baronies are conveyed, but at the end of the description there is added a general clause which, in my opinion, refers to the whole. It runs thus—"Cum castris . . . piscationibus salmonum . . . . omnibus aliis partibus pendiculis et pertinentibus terrarum baroniarum aliorumque praedict." This is a usual clause in such a charter. It is intended to gather up and enumerate the subordinate rights which are conveyed with the lands. And as it is made applicable to the "lands and baronies foresaid," I do not see on what principle of construction it can be limited. And unless it be read as applicable to the whole there would not be a grant of fishings with the barony of Lochow, though such a grant was contained in the crown charter of 14th March 1540. I am therefore of opinion that a right of salmon-fishing is given along with the lands and barony of Lochow.

The next question is, what is the legal meaning and effect of such a grant? I do not think that the answer is doubtful. A grant of lands with salmon-fishings implies a grant of the salmon-fishings in the rivers within or bounding the lands. If the river runs through the lands the owner of the lands has the sole right of fishing. If the river is the boundary he has the right to fish from his own bank. I take this to be clear and well-settled law, even though the river in which the salmon right exists is not mentioned in the charter. And similarly I hold that a grant of a barony with salmon-fishings confers an exclusive right to the fishings of such rivers as are within the barony, and a right to fish from one bank when the river is the boundary. Of course I am speaking of the effect of the grant itself, and apart from any question which may arise on possession or in regard to a competing title.

And in so holding I am not in any way violating the rule of the case of Cathcart. In that case there was a grant of a barony, but without any grant of salmon-fishings. Apart from possession therefore, the owner of the barony could have no right to salmon-fishings. He had a good title on which to prescribe such a right, or to put it otherwise, he might shew by his possession that the barony contained a grant of salmon-fishings. But in either view his right was necessarily measured by his possession. Such fishings as he possessed would be held to form part of the barony and no others, or if the barony is looked on as a title for prescription, he could only acquire by prescription such fishings as he actually possessed. But no such principle can be applied where there is an express grant of salmon-fishings. The right of the grantee depends on the legal construction of the grant, and is effectual without any possession.

I have now to consider whether the barony of Lochow extends to the River Awe, and on this point I do not think that there is any room for doubt. The lands belonging to the defender on the left bank are held of the pursuer, and are described in the titles as forming part of the barony of Lochow. The defender pleads that the lands held by him from the pursuer are not those called in the title Eachterachine; that the lands which now go by that name do not come down to the river; and that he possesses other lands called by a different name which lie between the river and Eachterachine. To my mind the plea has no force. The point is I think conclusively determined by the fact that the defender has no other title than that flowing from the Earls and Dukes of Argyll. Everything he possesses is possessed under that title and no other. I cannot therefore attach any importance to mere names which may be more or less accurate and more or less modern. As he has no title to any lands except such as are described as forming a part of the barony of Lochow, and as the lands which he possesses under that title are de facto bounded by the Awe, I hold that at this point and along the entire frontage of the defender's lands the barony is bounded by the Awe.

No. 207.

July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

From what I have said the inference is plain. The pursuer has a good title to the salmon-fishings in the Awe ex adverso of the defender's lands, and that title must prevail unless the defender can shew that he has a better title to these fishings. This he endeavours to do. But inasmuch as he does not allege a title prior in date to that of the pursuer, he can only prevail by shewing that he has possessed the fishings on a sufficient title and for the prescriptive period.

The defender connects himself with a crown charter granted to Sir D. Campbell of Lochnell on 26th July 1727, by which there was disponed and confirmed to him "Totas et integras terras baronium, balivatum et regalitatem de Kilmachronag alias vocat Muckairn," comprehending, inter alia, the lands of Ardchonnell, "cum salmonum piscatione aquae de Awe vizt. tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Polindownan et Polinstuck, et tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Cruback, et tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Sanluip jacen in aqua et ore ejusdem cum omnibus earundem privilegiis et pertinen, atqe. lie cruives super dictam aquam de Awe, omnes extenden ut praefertur et jacen in baronia de Ardchattan dominio de Lorn et vicecomitatu antedict. Una etiam cum officiis et privilegiis liberæ regalitatis justiciariae et balivatus omnium praedict. terrarum et terrarum de Muckairn aliorumque terrarum particulariter supramentionat cum molendinis piscationibus, insulis et omnibus earundem pertinen jacen infra omnes bondas hujusmodi." In these subjects the defender and his predecessors were duly infeft under titles regularly deduced from the crown charter. They have possessed the salmon draughts. Further, they have since 1846 possessed the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the lands of Eachterachine by rod-and-line fishing, and have drawn a considerable rental from them. Such possession has been complete and exclusive. There has been no cruive fishing within living memory. There are, however, the remains of a cruive at the eastmost limit of the defender's property. The history of it is very uncertain, and dependent entirely on local tradition. I am inclined to think that the probability is that it was erected by the Lorne Iron Forge Company when they were tenants of the defender's predecessor, and that it was taken down or disused on the objection of salmon-fishing owners on the other side of the Awe. But however this fact stands, we have no proof that the defender or his predecessors possessed any cruive fishing, or that they had any other possession of the fishings in question save by rod and line. At the same time I think that there can be no doubt but that this was the most profitable mode of possession.

There is a fact in connection with the state of possession which it is right to notice. We have before us three leases during the period from 1768 to 1810. They do not cover the entire period. They extend to thirty-five years in all.

To these the predecessors of the defender were parties, along with other proprietors on the Awe. It had been found that it was more advantageous for the several proprietors to let their fishings jointly than to let them separately. Hence the joint leases. In all these leases the fishings let by the defender's predecessors are described with slight variations as "All and haill the said Duncan Campbell's fishing upon the water of Aw, consisting of the following pools, viz., Criebag, Pollanstuickk and Pollandunan, with the stall-nett fishings upon Locheity near the mouth of the said water commonly called Sheanluib."

It is plain that these fishings do not comprise those which are now in question. Nor did the predecessors of the defender at that time assert a right to any other fishings than those which they actually let. For by the leases of 1794 and 1805 the lessors let to their tenants "all and whole the several salmon-fishings upon the water of Awe belonging to them respectively" with the exception of the chest or cruive fishings belonging to Campbell of Monzie. Nor can it be said that river fishings were of no value and could not be let. For Campbell of Monzie let nothing but river fishings, and he drew a third of the entire rent.

From this it will be seen that at a time not long posterior to the charter of 1727, the predecessors of the defender made no claim to the fishings in question as being comprehended within the barony of Kilmaronaig. Further, we have seen that that barony was erected in 1603 by crown charter granted to Sir John Calder. His successor obtained in 1673 from the Earl of Argyll a charter of confirmation applicable to the lands of Eachterachine, but under the reservations in favour of the granter and his successors of their whole fishings in the Awe. It is not conceivable that a charter with such a reservation would have been accepted if the fishings so reserved were claimed as part of the barony.

The title to which the defender ascribes his possession is, as I have said, the charter of 1727. He contends in the first place that he and his predecessors have possessed on a title of barony, and that barony includes per expressum the lands of Ardchonnell and the draught fishings and cruive fishings in the water of Awe. If we are to look at the charter of 1727 alone, it is clear that these lands and fishings are comprehended within the barony. But it is a charter by progress, and is not the charter of erection. It recites the charter of erection as being a charter granted by James VI. in 1603. On returning to that charter we find that it does not comprise the lands of Ardchonnell or the fishings above mentioned. It was urged that the charter of 1727 merely contained a fuller description of the same lands. But this cannot be, because the lands of Ardchonnell are held for a separate feu-duty, which is not specified in the charter of 1603. Therefore I cannot hold that the lands of Ardchonnell and the salmon draughts and cruive fishings are part of the barony of Kilmaronaig.

But not the less is the defender the owner of a barony, though it does not comprehend these lands and their pertinents. It is situate at a distance from the Awe, and does not per expressum contain any fishings in that river. The question then comes to be whether the defender can ascribe his possession to his barony title.

It is not sufficient for the defender that he has had possession, and that he has a barony title. The two things must be capable of being legally connected.

The case of Hunt v. The Crown[1] shews that the mere possession of a subject does not establish that it is part of the barony of which the possessor is the owner. For it was held by the House of Lords that though Mr Hunt had possessed the Palace of Dunfermline for the prescriptive period, his possession did not prove that it was part of his barony of Pittencreiff. Their Lordships construed the barony title. They held that it did not contain the palace, and the possession was in consequence of no avail.

[1] Feb. 11, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 1.

No. 207.

July 9, 1891. Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

We, in like manner, must construe the defender's title, and I am unable to hold that it comprehends, or that it can be read as capable of comprehending, salmon-fishings in the Awe. Such fishings as are given out in general terms are given out with the lands, and such fishings as are specially mentioned are plainly not in that river. I think that we should violate the rules of legitimate construction if we held that such a grant could embrace fishings in a river so distant as the Awe. For the fishings are defined by reference to the lands in connection with which they are given out. I do not say that fishings so granted are necessarily limited to the fishings within or ex adverso of the lands. But if it had been intended that fishings so distant as those in question should be included in the barony, I think that they would have been specially disponed. In the absence of any such disposition, I hold that they are not contained in the barony, and that mere possession will not shew that they are comprehended within it. In so holding I am following the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford in the case of Lord Lovat v. The Crown. There is nothing to indicate that the predecessors of the defender possessed the fishings contemporaneously with the erection of the barony, or at any time when they were owners of the barony alone. The presumption, and indeed the proof, are entirely to the contrary. For I have shewn that in their title to the lands of Eachterachine, granted in 1673, the fishings are reserved to the Earl of Argyll, and that they made no claim to them when they granted leases in the end of the last century and the beginning of the present. I am therefore bound to deal with the case on the footing that the possession began in 1846. I do not think that I would be justified in ascribing the modern possession to an ancient title which was not followed by possession for nearly two hundred and fifty years, or in other words in holding that the predecessors of the defender began in 1846 to possess the fishings under a charter which was granted in 1603. The case of the defender would have been stronger, and might have been sufficient if the fishings in question could be regarded as an enlargement of the fishings which had been from ancient times possessed under the barony title. But I think that that is impossible. They are different fishings and situate in a wholly different locality. And considering that they have been possessed from the lands of Eachterachine, they seem to be the fishings of these lands and in no sense to be fishings of the barony.

But the defender has yet another title to which he ascribes his possession. He is infeft in the lands of Ardchonnell "cum salmonum piscatione super aquam de Awe"—viz., the three draughts which have been mentioned "atque lie cruivis super dictam aquam."

It is in favour of the defender that these salmon-fishings are not given out in connection with adjoining lands. For the lands of Ardchonnell are not situate on the River Awe, but, as I understand, about ten miles from it. There is not therefore the usual limitation in the grant, and we may the more easily read the defender's title as comprising the whole fishings in the River Awe.

But we can only so read it if the words "cruives on the said water of Awe" can bear such a meaning. The defender indeed contends that he has a general grant of all the fishings in the Awe. But I cannot adopt that view. It is neither consistent with the words of the charter nor the possession which has followed on it. I construe the charter as being a grant of particular fishings—viz., the three salmon draughts and the cruives in the water of Awe.

No. 207.

July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

But it is said that the fishing by cruives is the highest mode of salmon-fishing known to the law, and therefore that a grant of cruive fishing means, or may mean, a grant of salmon-fishings, so as to furnish a sufficient title for prescriptive possession.

The Lord Ordinary, without expressing a decided opinion, thinks that the title of the defender is sufficient. He says "that a grant in general terms of salmon-fishing over a river (or at all events over a river like the Awe) followed by an enumeration of specified salmon draughts and unspecified cruives is at least a sufficient title on which to prescribe if necessary the whole salmon-fishings of the river." He seems to think that there is a general grant of salmon-fishings. As I have already said, I do not concur in that opinion. The grant is not general but specific. It consists of certain specified pools and of cruives. The pools are known and have been possessed by the defender. I do not see how a grant to the fishing of these pools is a title for prescribing other fishings. Nor do I think that the grant of cruives can be read as a general grant of the salmon-fishings in the Awe. The most authoritative exposition of such a grant is to be found in the opinion of Lord Blackburn in the case of Lord Lovat v. The Crown. Without expressing a final opinion on a question which was not necessary for the decision, his Lordship says that a grant of cruives is merely a right to fish by cruives at the places where such engines have been or may be erected. I think that I am bound to proceed on this view of the law, and it seems to be conclusive against the defender's title, in so far as it is founded on a grant of cruives.

But the case does not turn on that consideration alone. For inasmuch as the charter contains a grant of particular fishings followed by a grant of cruives in the same river we would violate the ordinary rules of construction if we were to hold that the latter grant comprised, or was intended to comprise, the whole fishings. There is no meaning in the former grant if the latter is held to include it. I think therefore that I am bound to construe the grant as a grant of particular fishings, and consequently it is not a sufficient title on which to prescribe a right to fishings generally.

But there is another limitation on the defender's title which it is proper to notice. I need not say that the defender cannot prescribe any subject which lies beyond the limit of his title. The whole subjects granted by the charter of 1727 are described as lying within the lordship of Lorne. On the south side of the Awe, this lordship does not extend further eastward than the Nant, while the lands on the north side are within it. It seems to me difficult to hold that salmon-fishings ex adverso of the barony of Lochow can lie within the lordship of Lorne. If they had been possessed in conformity with the grant—that is to say, if the defender had possessed cruive fishings—this difficulty might have been overcome. But I cannot attribute any such force to a possession by rod and line only from the lands of Lochow. Such possession indicates that the fishings which have been so possessed are the fishings of those lands rather than fishings lying within the lordship of Lorne.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to our judgment. The grant of cruives not having been followed by possession is unavailing to the defender, for the title of the pursuer is prior in date, and comprises the whole fishings ex adverso of the defender's lands. A grant of cruive fishings within the fishings previously given to the pursuer would, in my opinion, be invalid, because it would be in derogation of a prior title.

No. 207.

July 9, 1891. Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

LORD YOUNG.—I understand that your Lordship and Lord Trayner concur in the judgment which Lord Rutherfurd Clark has just delivered. I am obliged to say that I dissent, and I shall state my ground of dissent very briefly. I assume, of course,—indeed it is not disputed—that the Duke of Argyll is proprietor of the barony of Lochow. I shall further assume what is disputed, and is contrary to the view of the Lord Ordinary upon the case as presented to him, that the Duke is also proprietor of the salmon-fishings thereof, that is pertaining thereto. The question is, upon these assumptions, whether he is proprietor of the fishings in question in the River Awe. There is not in his title a specification of salmon-fishings in the River Awe; but it is said that the barony of which, with the fishings pertaining thereto, he is the owner adjoins the River Awe and comes down to the banks of it, and that it is therefore to be assumed that the fishings in the river are fishings pertaining to the barony. I cannot assent to that. A title to a barony is a good title to all the water therein—that is to say, all the land covered with water, such as a lake or river; a title to a barony is a title to the land, including waters and rivers within the bounds and limits of the barony. But the franchise of fishing for salmon in waters which contain salmon is another matter. The franchise of salmon-fishing pertaining to a barony is not at all necessarily limited to waters which are within the bounds and limits of the barony. Salmon-fishings in the sea ex adverso of the barony but not within the bounds and limits thereof, and salmon-fishings in the sea not ex adverso of the barony at all, may very well be salmon-fishings of the barony and pertaining thereto. On the other hand, the salmon-fishings of a barony and pertaining thereto do not necessarily include the franchise of fishing in all the waters within the barony. On the one hand, as I have stated, the right of fishing pertaining to a barony, and conveyed by a title to the barony with the fishings, may be outwith the bounds of the barony altogether; that is, the franchise, the right may be exercised in waters outside the barony. On the other hand, the franchise of fishing in waters within the barony may be no part of the fishings of the barony. I therefore cannot assent to the proposition that it is to be assumed that the fishings, the right of fishing for salmon in the water of Awe, is the right of salmon-fishing of the barony and pertaining thereto, because the lands of the barony adjoin and extend to the banks of the River Awe; and indeed upon the face of the summons and record here the pursuer assumes that his barony fishings do not include all the fishings in the River Awe, although his barony extends down to the river all along the banks. There may therefore be salmon-fishings in waters to which the barony adjoins, or in waters which are within the barony which are no part of the fishings of the barony at all. I think it is a question of evidence, a question of identification, whether any particular fishing, the right of fishing in any particular water, is a right of salmon-fishing of and pertaining to the barony or not. It is a question of fact, a question of identification, upon which possession is the most material of all evidence. I do not say it is the only evidence, but it is the most obvious and the most common.

No. 207.
July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

We have not in this case any occasion to consider the question whether a title of barony with the salmon-fishings pertaining thereto does not prima facie apply to all waters within the limits of the barony, that is to say, prima facie, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary. That may be so, and I shall assume if you please that it is. But possession adverse to that view may have existed for any period you please. Here the possession is adverse to the view that the fishings in question are in fact and as a matter of identification fishings of the barony of Lochow; all the possession which has ever existed is adverse to that view. Lord Rutherfurd Clark has pointed out upon an examination of the evidence that the possession of the particular fishing here,—and that is upon an examination of the defender's title, which I am not considering now,—the possession of these particular fishings has only existed since 1846,—that is a period of forty-five years,—very close upon half a century; and so far as I see the case would have been the same in principle upon evidence, so far as principle goes, if the possession had been for 100 years or 200 years. The proprietor of Lochnell, or anybody else you like, but never the proprietor of the barony of Lochow, has possessed these fishings for a century or two centuries; nevertheless as the Duke has a title to the barony of Lochow, with the fishings thereof, prima facie these belong to him. I think upon that evidence they do not. Whoever they may belong to they do not belong to him. The evidence is abundantly sufficient to shew that these are not part of the fishings of the barony. I am exaggerating it into possession for a century or two centuries. Here it is only possession for forty-five years. The party who has possessed (the defender) refers to a title—a variety of deeds and a variety of facts—to shew that he has the right. The titles upon which he relies, and the grounds upon which he relies upon them, are subject to very powerful objections, critical objections. I shall assume that they are strong, and the defender might therefore in a question with the Crown, which, if these fishings have not been given off otherwise, is the party to contend with, find them very formidable. His right, his title to defend the possession which he has had for forty-five years, or for a century or two centuries, may be difficult enough to maintain or easy enough to maintain with the Crown, but the Crown is making no dispute in the matter. It is the proprietor of the barony of Lochow, who has been proprietor of the barony during all that period of possession of forty-five years as it happens,—he might have been, as I have said, for centuries,—and he has never had any possession at all. I am therefore disposed to agree in the view of the Lord Ordinary, independently of his assumption that there is not an express grant of salmon-fishings to the Baron of Lochow —of the salmon-fishings pertaining to the barony.

I am of opinion that the pursuer has failed to shew that he has a title to these salmon-fishings in dispute, and that being so, I am further of opinion that he has no title to challenge the defender's possession, or to examine the defender's title. That is exactly my opinion. He is seeking to disturb a possession which has existed so far back as evidence will reach, and might have been for any period so far as the legal principle is concerned. He is challenging that possession, seeking to disturb it and take it to himself, he never having had it. Now, if the defender had got at any time a title from the Crown, he would have had an excellent good title. The Crown could not have given it if these are part of the fishings of the barony of Lochow, for they had parted with the fishings of the barony of Lochow and conveyed them to the Duke of Argyll. But if

No. 207.
July 9, 1891.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

the Crown had conveyed them to the defender, what would the conclusion have been? Not that they were violating and acting contrary to their grant to the Baron of Lochow, but that these fishings in the River Awe were no part of the barony of Lochow. That is a matter of evidence and identification, and so any adverse possession—for it is adverse possession as the Lord Ordinary somewhat emphatically says—will upon a question of identifying the fishings of and pertaining to the barony be most material, and may be conclusive against the baron with respect to fishings in the waters locally situated within the barony, just as it will be for him with respect to waters locally situated outwith the limits of the barony. The fishings will be identified by possession for him in the one case, against him in the other case. As I suggested in the course of the argument as to the patronage of church livings of the barony, and pertaining to the barony—the identification of these also is a question of fact to be determined most obviously by possession, although there may be other evidence. Prima facie you would assume, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that the patronage, church patronage, related to livings, parishes, benefices within the limits of the barony. But it might be shewn by possession, by evidence appropriate to such a subject, that patronage to a living outwith the barony was a patronage pertaining to that barony; and, on the other hand, that the patronage to a living, a parish altogether situated within the barony, was not a patronage pertaining to the barony at all. If, for example, during 100 years another party had always presented to a particular parish church, without challenge or interruption, that would be, I should assume, conclusive evidence that that was not a presentation pertaining to the baron. He might not be able to exhibit a title, one not, at all events, subject to criticism on the part of the Crown or any other having right, if he did not establish his; but for the Baron of Lochow to assert (assuming the right of patronage still to exist) a right of presentation to a church within the barony, to which he had never presented, and to which another had always presented during the period of a century, would be a proposition to which I could not have assented.

And so with respect to these fishings in the Awe. I have pointed out the grounds upon which I am of opinion that the fact that the lands of the barony come down to the margin of the river is not conclusive, and is not sufficient to countervail the possession to the contrary which has been had, it may be, upon an examinable title, and one subject to objections if the Crown chooses to challenge it, for if these fishings are not part of the barony of Lochow they belong to the Crown now, unless they have been given off to some other by a sufficient title; and that they are not part of the barony is the conclusion which I arrive at, upon the grounds which I have just expressed.

LORD TRAYNER and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred with Lord Rutherfurd Clark.

THE COURT granted decree, in terms of the conclusions of the action.

LINDSAY, HOWE, & CO., W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 208.
July 9, 1891.
Kruuse v. Drynan & Co.

WILHELM KRUUSE AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—Salvesen—Peddie.

A. B. DRYNAN & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Dickson—Deas.

Ship—Demurrage—Charter-party—Delivery retarded by fault of railway.—A ship with a cargo of pit props, at the port of delivery, was berthed at a

No. 208.

July 9, 1891.

Kruuse v. Drynan & Co.

quay where, by the rules of the harbour, such a cargo could not be deposited. Delay in taking delivery took place in consequence of a railway company failing to provide a sufficient supply of trucks. Held that it was no answer to a claim for demurrage that the delay was caused by the fault of the railway company.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians.

WILHELM KRUUSE AND OTHERS, owners of the Swedish steamer "Aage," raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Linlithgow against A. B. Drynan & Company, Bo'ness, for payment of £32 as the amount of demurrage alleged to be due by the defenders at £8 per day, in respect that they, as receivers of a cargo of pit props, had detained the "Aage" four days beyond the period within which she could have been discharged in terms of her charter-party.

The defenders denied liabilty.

By charter-party between the pursuers' agents and Telef Jensen, timber-merchant, Krageroe, the "Aage" was chartered to load a cargo of pit props at Swedsbughten and proceed to Bo'ness, the cargo to be discharged as per bill of lading. The charter-party provided that,—"Cargo . . . to be discharged in Bo'ness as quick as vessel can discharge, . . . and should the vessel over this time be detained, there is payable for every lay-day £8, besides freight."

The "Aage" arrived in Bo'ness Roads on 2d September 1890, and was berthed in Bo'ness Dock early on the morning of 3d September (Wednesday), and was ready for discharge at ten on that forenoon.

The master called on the defenders. They had not received the bill of lading, or any advice as to the cargo; but, acting on telegraphic authority, their agent, Mr Ommundsen, a licensed stevedore, undertook, on the forenoon of 3d September, to take delivery of the cargo.

Discharge was completed on Monday, 8th September, at six P.M.

The pursuers stated;—"Reckoning from ten o'clock forenoon of 3d September 1890, the discharging would have been completed by ten o'clock forenoon of 5th September 1890, had the defenders accepted delivery in terms of the charter-party, so that the said steamship was unduly detained in unloading said cargo and deck load for four days [being Friday 5th, after ten, Saturday 6th, Sunday 7th, Monday 8th September] over and above the said two days in which the said steamship could have been discharged."

The defenders stated that they were entitled, according to general rule, to twenty-four hours' notice from the shipmaster to make arrangements for receiving the cargo, such as providing workers, waggons, and machinery, that discharge began at four o'clock on Wednesday 3d and was continued with all reasonable speed, and was continued on Thursday 4th, "but on Friday 5th no discharge took place, as the North British Railway could not or did not supply" the defenders' agent "with waggons in which to place the cargo, and as the vessel was berthed on the south side of the lock, where timber is not allowed to be laid down, the ship could not on that day deliver any cargo." They stated that twelve hours were thus lost on Friday (5th) and five on Saturday (6th), making seventeen hours in all, and that they discharged the vessel in thirty-two working hours, thus giving the vessel in the circumstances good dispatch. "The usual time to discharge a vessel of her burden and cargo should not be less than four days."

From the proof it appeared that the discharge began on the afternoon of the 3d, and was interrupted by want of waggons, as the defenders stated, on the Friday and part of Saturday. The discharge was completed on Monday the 8th at 6 P.M. The actual time spent in discharging was twenty-six hours. The defenders led the evidence of their agent and the harbourmaster to shew that the reason why discharge had to be stopped was that they had not waggons from the railway company, and that the harbourmaster had declined to allow timber to be laid down at that part of the harbour. No custom of the port on that subject was proved. There was evidence that if the ship had been berthed on the north side of the harbour prop-wood might have been laid down.

No. 208. July 9, 1891. Kruuse v. Drynan & Co.

On 9th January 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Melville) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers' steamship 'Aage' was unduly detained in unloading her cargo and deck load of pit props in Bo'ness harbour for three days, videlicet, Friday 5th, Saturday 6th, and Monday 8th September 1890 (excluding Sunday 7th, which was not a working-day), and that the sum of £8 per day is due for demurrage in terms of the charter-party: Therefore decerns against the defenders in favour of the pursuers for the sum of £24 sterling." *

On appeal the Sheriff (Rankine), on 29th April, recalled the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute and pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers' steamship 'Aage' was berthed in Bo'ness harbour early in the morning of Wednesday 3d September 1890, and was ready for discharge of cargo at ten A.M. on that day; finds that in ordinary circumstances a reasonable period for unloading would have been twenty-six hours; finds that thirteen hours fall to be added in calculating the duration of said period on account of unavoidable delay due to lack of waggons, for which the defenders were not responsible; finds that said period lapsed during the course of Saturday, 6th September 1890; finds that the cargo was not fully discharged till the afternoon of the following Monday; finds that the rate of demurrage prescribed in the charter-party was £8 per day; finds that the defenders are liable to the pursuers in demurrage for two days, being £16, subject to payment of expenses as hereinafter found due." †

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the ship might have been discharged on Wednesday 3d, and Thursday 4th, and the morning of Friday the 5th September, while from the evidence it was the following Monday evening before the discharging was completed. He also thinks the pursuers are not responsible for the want of railway waggons, which the defenders allege was the cause of the delay."

† "NOTE.—The charter-party as translated is somewhat obscure, which may be accounted for by the fact that the form used contemplated the fixing down of lay-days, from the close of which the period of demurrage should run, while the gap left for the number of lay-days has not been filled in. It must therefore be assumed that the intention was to allow a reasonable time for unloading at Bo'ness, 'as quick as the vessel can discharge,' and to calculate the demurrage from the lapse of that time. In estimating this reasonable time it is proper (as has been assumed in the proof and argument) to figure on working hours. Again, it appears to be plain that the ship cannot be allowed to suffer from the negligence of the consigners or freighters in not forwarding news by post or telegraph in time to enable the consignees or their agents to prepare for discharging. Lastly, the custom of Bo'ness is expressly incorporated into the contract; and no one seems to have taken exception at the time to the berthing of the steamer at the south side of the harbour, which was probably, on a balance of advantages, the more expeditious discharging place, in spite of the risk of stoppage under the port rule, known to both parties, against unloading pit props on the quay.

"Applying these rules, I cannot throw the point of time at which the duty to commence unloading set in further forward than 10 A.M. on the Wednesday, when, according to the harbourmaster and other witnesses, the vessel was entered at the Custom-House. Secondly, the case being one of those in which lay-days are not prescribed, the rule laid down in such decisions as Postlethwaite, 5 App. Cas. 529, and Wyllie, 13 R. 92, applies. It must be assumed—though there is

No. 208.

July 9, 1891.
Kruuse v. Drynan & Co.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—If the defenders could not take delivery for want of waggons the loss fell upon them, not upon the ship, for it was their business to provide them. The case of Wyllie[1] relied on by the Sheriff was distinguishable. No custom of the port preventing prop-wood from being laid down was proved. The Sheriff-substitute had erred in not including Sunday, which though not a working-day counted as a demurrage-day.

Argued for defenders;—The case of Wyllie was in point. The harbour-master had refused to allow wood to be laid on the quay, and no waggons could be obtained. The defenders were thus prevented by unavoidable causes from taking delivery any faster. They had, excluding such delay, and that of Sunday, which was not a working-day, only taken a reasonable time.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It appears to me that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was right, though he fell into error upon one point which I shall afterwards allude to. This vessel was capable of being discharged in twenty-six hours after she came to her berth. That seems clear, for that was the time which was actually occupied when the operation was once begun, and I think that the causes which led to the delay were not causes for which the defenders can excuse themselves. The main cause which the defenders put forward was that they were prevented from taking delivery by the want of waggons from the railway company. This may have been the fact, but I take it that that was a matter for them to arrange, and with which the ship had nothing to do.

I think that the case of Wyllie v. Harrison has no application here. There is no proof that there is any custom of port in unloading pit props at Bo'ness. The harbour-master was asked the question, and he could give no evidence of such a custom. I think that in the circumstances demurrage for the whole time sued for, viz., four days, should be charged against the defenders, and that the Sheriff-substitute made a mistake in excluding Sunday. In estimating demurrage-days Sunday ought to be counted.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. I have no doubt that the Sheriff-substitute was right, except in making the mistake of excluding Sunday.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of date 9th January little evidence on the point—that the defenders did all they could in pressing the railway company to furnish sufficient waggons, for they had no contrary interest, and the pursuers do not accuse them of negligence. Mr Ommundsen's estimate of thirteen hours as the amount of delay thus caused is explicit, and, as I think, trustworthy. The nominal period for discharge may, for the purposes of the case, be fixed at twenty-six hours. Adding this period to the thirteen hours of unavoidable delay, the number of working hours after 10 A.M. on the Wednesday from which the defenders cannot be held liable as in mora is thirty-nine. This, calculated on a twelve hours' day, beginning at 6 A.M., brings the parties down to 1 P.M. on the Saturday, at which hours, if these views be correct, the whole cargo should have been out. Thereafter the demurrage period commences, and must in terms of the charter-party be calculated by days—i.e., according to a fixed rule of interpretation, running, not working days, since the vessel, if unloaded, might have sailed off in ballast. Saturday was a lay-day, i.e., a day during which discharge might go on without liability for delay, and therefore cannot be counted among the demurrage-days. So that these are two in number—Sunday and Monday—and the sum due is £8 per day, or £16 in all."

---

[1] Wyllie v. Harrison & Co., Oct. 29, 1885, 13 R. 92.

No. 208.

July 9, 1891. Kruuse v. Drynan & Co.

1891, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff of date 29th April 1891: Find that the pursuers' steamship 'Aage' was unduly detained in unloading the cargo and deck load of pit props in Bo'ness harbour for four days, viz., Friday 5th, Saturday 6th, Sunday 7th, and Monday 8th September 1890, and that the sum of £8 per day is due for demurrage in the terms of the charter-party: Therefore decern against the defenders in favour of the pursuers for the sum of £32 sterling, to account of which appoint the sum of £20, consigned in the hands of the Clerk of the Sheriff Court on 10th October last, to be paid over to the pursuers," &c.

J. & A. PEDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 209.

July 9, 1891. Durrant Steuart's Trustees v. Durrant Steuart.

THOMAS GOLDIE DICKSON AND ANOTHER (Durrant Steuart's Trustees), First Parties.—Wallace.

MRS ALICE KATHERINE DURRANT STEUART, Second Party.—Cullen.

Marriage-contract—Jus relictæ—Implied exclusion of—General words of exclusion.—Terms of antenuptial marriage-contract, executed abroad in foreign form, between a domiciled Scotsman and a foreign lady, from which it was held that an exclusion of the jus relictæ was to be implied.

1ST DIVISION. C.

MR CHARLES DURRANT STEUART, of Dalguise, Perthshire, was married at Cape Town in 1889 to Miss Alice Katherine Reus, of Cape Colony. Prior to their marriage the parties entered into the antenuptial contract of marriage which is quoted below.* The marriage was dissolved by the

* The antenuptial contract was in the following terms:—"Know, all men whom it may concern, That on this the 27th day of March in the year of our Lord 1889, before me, Murdoch Morison Tait of Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, notary-public, by lawful authority duly sworn and admitted, and in the presence of the subscribed witnesses, personally came and appeared Charles Horace Durrant Steuart of Dalguise, Perthshire, Scotland, but presently of Wynberg, in the Cape Division, a widower, and Alice Katherine Reus of Rondelosch, in the Cape Division, a spinster, both the appearers being of the full age of majority and upwards, and the appearers declared that whereas a marriage has been agreed upon and is intended to be shortly had and solemnised between them, the said Charles Horace Durrant Steuart and Alice Katherine Reus, they do, by these presents, contract and agree each with the other as follows:—

"(First) That there shall be no community of property or of profit or loss between the said intended consorts, but that he or she shall respectively retain and possess all his or her estate and effects, moveable and immoveable, in possession, reversion, expectancy, or contingency, as fully and effectually as if the said intended marriage did not take place.

"(Second) That the one of them shall not be answerable for the debts and engagements of the other of them, whether contracted before or after the said intended marriage.

"(Third) That all inheritances, legacies, gifts, or bequests which may devolve upon, or be left, given, or bequeathed to either of the said intended consorts shall be the sole and exclusive property of him or her upon or to whom the same shall devolve or be left, given, or bequeathed.

"(Fourth) That each of the said intended consorts shall be at full liberty to dispose of his or her property and effects by will, codicil, or other testamentary disposition as he or she may think fit, without the hindrance or interference in any manner of the other of them, and that the marital power which the husband by law possesses is expressly excluded; and he is hereby deprived of it over the estate of his said intended spouse.

"(Fifth) That for and in consideration of the said intended marriage the said

No. 209.

July 9, 1891. Durrant Steuart's Trustees v. Durrant Steuart.

death of Mr Steuart at Dalguise on 29th December 1890, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 6th March 1883. On the death of her husband Mrs Steuart claimed jus relictæ in addition to the provision in her favour under the antenuptial contract. This claim was resisted by the trustees under Mr Steuart's trust-disposition and settlement, who maintained that the widow was barred by the marriage-contract from claiming jus relictæ in addition to her conventional provision.

A special case was accordingly presented, the trustees being the first parties and Mrs Steuart the second party.

Besides setting forth the facts already narrated, the case stated:—"Mr Durrant Steuart was at the time of his death domiciled in Scotland. The Charles Horace Durrant Steuart agrees to, and hereby does, give and grant unto and settle upon his said intended consort, Alice Katherine Reus absolutely, and as her sole, free, and uncontrolled property, the sum of £3000 sterling, to be paid her in cash after the death of him the said Charles Horace Durrant Steuart, out of such funds as may be realised out of the estate left by him at the time of his decease: And for the better securing of the said Alice Katherine Reus the said sum of £3000, he the said Charles Horace Durrant Steuart doth hereby further give, and grant unto, and settle upon her, the said Alice Katherine Reus, all the furniture, pictures, plate, and other moveables (with the exception, however, of the family portraits and such moveables as are or may be made heirlooms) contained in all the houses the property of him the said Charles Horace Durrant Steuart situate on the estate of Dalguise, Perthshire, Scotland; upon condition, however, that should there be sufficient funds realised out of the estate of him the said Charles Horace Durrant Steuart, or from any other source whatsoever, to meet and liquidate the claim of the said Alice Katherine Reus in full, then that this settlement of the furniture, pictures, plate, and other moveables shall forthwith be annulled and of no effect, but that should there be insufficient funds realised to meet the said claim in full, or only sufficient to meet the said claim in part, then that the said furniture, pictures, plate, and other moveables, or such portion thereof as may be necessary, shall be realised for the benefit and on account of the said Alice Katherine Reus in order to meet and liquidate her said claim, or such deficiency thereof as may be due to her: The condition and intent of the whole of this settlement being that the said Alice Katherine Reus shall receive the full sum of £3000 hereby settled upon her, but neither more nor less.

---

"(Sixth) And the said Charles Horace Durrant Steuart declared the conditions upon which the aforegoing settlements are made to be, that if the said Alice Katherine Reus shall predecease him leaving no issue born of their marriage, then that the settlements hereby made and created shall forthwith cease and determine, and all and everything hereby settled shall revert to him the said Charles Horace Durrant Steuart: But that if the said Alice Katherine Reus shall predecease him, leaving issue born of their marriage, then and in such case the sum of £3000 and the other property hereby settled upon her shall devolve upon and become the absolute property of such issue, but upon the same terms and conditions as are hereinbefore set forth.

"(Seventh) And the said Alice Katherine Reus declared to have accepted the said donation and settlement upon the terms and conditions hereinbefore set forth.

"Upon all which conditions and stipulations the said appearers declared it to be their intention to solemnise their said intended marriage, hereby mutually promising to act up to the tenour of these presents under obligation of their persons and property according to law.

"Thus done, contracted, and agreed at Cape Town, on the day of the month and year first before written, in the presence of the witnesses Matthew Blake and George Marquard Findlay, who, together with the appearers and me the notary, have subscribed to the original hereof now filed and remaining in my protocol."

No. 209.

July 9, 1891. Durrant Steuart's Trustees v. Durrant Steuart.

clear rental of Dalguise after deducting taxes and interest of debt is £581, and the net personal estate in Scotland left by Mr Durrant Steuart, given up in the inventory thereof, amounts to £5884, after deducting the foresaid provision of £3000 and his other personal debts. He also left real and personal estate at the Cape, valued in said inventory at £2300. The whole residue of his said personal estate is, by his said trust-disposition and settlement, conveyed to the parties of the first part for behoof of his wife and children by a former marriage, other than the child who should succeed to him in the estate of Dalguise. Mr Durrant Steuart was survived by only one child, a son by his first marriage, who is now the proprietor of Dalguise."

The question of law was,—"Is the second party barred by the terms of the antenuptial contract from claiming jus relictæ in addition to the special provision of £3000?"

Argued for the first parties;—An antenuptial contract might exclude legal rights by implication, provided the intention of the parties to exclude the right was clear.[1] Such an intention was clear in the present case. It was impossible to read the deed without seeing that the parties intended their legal rights to have no place. No doubt, if the clause of exclusion barred a number of rights specifically and nothing more, without mentioning the particular right in question, it had been held that the particular right would not be regarded as excluded, although the fair inference might be that the parties by mentioning an analogous right in a foreign system intended the Scots right to be excluded also.[2] Here, however, the parties had not confined themselves to a specific enumeration of rights which they knew about; they added general words, which were sufficiently wide to carry the widow's legal rights according to Scots law. At all events, the proviso at the end of clause five made the intention of the parties clear beyond dispute.

Argued for the second party;—The presumption against the exclusion of legal rights by implication was a peculiarly strong one, and had not here been overcome. There was nothing in the deed to shew that the parties had the law of Scotland before them when contracting, and if they had not, the authorities proved that they must be held to have intended the legal rights given by that law to stand. The words at the end of the fifth clause referred to the "settlement" provided by that clause, and not to the deed as a whole.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My first impression was that our judgment must, on pretty clear grounds, be in favour of the first parties. I am still of that opinion, although not so confidently.

The deed before us is in the form of an antenuptial contract of marriage, and although it is not expressed in the usual technical language to which we are accustomed, we must take it as an instrument intended to fix certain points between the parties during their joint lives. The leading idea of the contract appears to be that each of the spouses is to retain his or her own estate independently of the other spouse, and in reference to the question which we have now to determine a great deal depends on the fifth head of the contract, but in order to appreciate the meaning and effect of that head it is necessary to keep in view certain of the other provisions of the deed.

---

[1] Fraser, Husband and Wife, p. 1061.

[2] Breadalbane's Trustees v. Chandos, Aug. 16, 1836, 2 S. and M'L. 377. Keith's Trustees v. Keith, July 17, 1857, 19 D. 1040, 29 Scot. Jur. 497.

No. 209.
July 9, 1891.
Durrant Steuart's Trustees v. Durrant Steuart.

The first head begins by declaring "that there shall be no community of property or of profit or loss between the said intended consorts." That, as I read it, means that parties knew of the existence of a legal doctrine of the communio bonorum between spouses, and desired to exclude its operation in their own case. Then they go on in very simple language to say "that he or she shall respectively retain and possess all his or her estate and effects, moveable and immoveable, in possession, reversion, expectancy or contingency, as fully and effectually as if the said intended marriage did not take place." The fourth head is also important, for it provides "that each of the said intended consorts shall be at full liberty to dispose of his or her property and effects by will, codicil, or other testamentary disposition as he or she may think fit, without the hindrance or interference in any manner of the other of them, and that the marital power which the husband by law possesses is expressly excluded; and he is hereby deprived of it over the estate of his said intended spouse." Mr Cullen argued that the marital power here spoken of was the husband's power of administration, and I admit that there is a good deal to countenance that view in the mere words of the fourth head taken by themselves, but if the fourth head is to be construed by reference to the first head—as I think it ought to be—I think it is perfectly clear that the marital power which is excluded is not merely the husband's right of administration but every kind of right which a husband may be supposed by law to have.

Keeping these two heads of the contract particularly in view, we come to the fifth head, which is certainly very peculiar in some respects. It is a provision by which the husband settles a sum of £3000 in cash upon his intended wife, to be paid to her after his death, and if she should predecease him this £3000 is, by the sixth head, settled on the issue of the marriage, if there are any. The fifth head further settles certain furniture and other moveables on the wife, in security of the provision of £3000, and only in so far as there should be insufficient funds to meet that £3000 in full. The fifth head then ends with these words:—"The condition and intent of the whole of this settlement being that the said Alice Katherine Reus (that is the wife) shall receive the full sum of £3000 hereby settled upon her, but neither more nor less."

The parties are at issue as to the construction of this fifth head, and particularly as to the words at the end which I have just quoted. The second party maintains that the settlement which is there spoken of is the particular provision of the fifth head itself, and nothing else, and therefore she contends that the meaning is that she is to receive the sum of £3000, neither more or less, as the result of the fifth head, but that none of her legal rights were to be affected. Now, if the estates of the spouses had not been subject to the provisions of the first and fourth heads of the contract, there might have been a great deal of force in that argument, but I am unable to read the fifth head without reference to the other clauses to which I have adverted, for I think the meaning depends on the construction of the three clauses taken together; and taking them together, I do not see how it is possible to say that the provision of £3000 is to be held as additional to any legal rights to which the wife might be entitled by the law of her husband's domicile, for that would be contrary to clauses one and four. I think that there is no room for jus relictæ under this contract. Each spouse by the contract retained his or her own estate independently of the other; and there is therefore, by the condition of the contract, no estate out of which such legal rights can arise. I am therefore for answering the question in favour of the first parties.

No. 209.
July 9, 1891.
Durrant Steuart's Trustees v. Durrant Steuart.

LORD ADAM.—The present question arises on the construction of the antenuptial marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Steuart. The question is whether Mrs Steuart is entitled to her jus relictæ in addition to her provisions under the contract. It appears to me that that is a question as to the intention of the contracting parties. I do not know any reason why effect should not be given to what we may arrive at as having been the intention of the parties, and if we are satisfied that it was the intention of the parties that the jus relictæ should be excluded, then I think we must give effect to that intention. Notwithstanding Mr Cullen's very clear argument, I think that it was the intention of the parties to exclude the jus relictæ.

The solution of the question appears to me to depend as much upon the first four articles of the contract as upon the fifth. The first article provides that there is to be no community of property between the spouses, but that each is to retain his or her estate as fully and effectually as if the said intended marriage did not take place. I think that even if the deed had stopped there the widow's claim would be excluded, because I cannot see how the husband's reservation of his full right of property in his own estate just as if the marriage had not taken place is consistent with the widow's jus relictæ over the same estate. But the deed does not stop there, for the fourth clause provides,—"That each of the said intended consorts shall be at full liberty to dispose of his or her property and effects by will, codicil, or other testamentary disposition as he or she may think fit, without the hindrance or interference in any manner of the other of them, and that the marital power which the husband by law possesses is expressly excluded; and he is hereby deprived of it over the estate of his said intended spouse." Mr Cullen asks us to read this as not referring to the extent of the property, the power of disposing of which is reserved, but only as dealing with the property which each spouse might legally dispose of. In effect his argument came to this, that you are to read into the deed the words "in so far as he or she legally may" as if the reservation by each spouse were of his or her "whole property subject to the provisions of this contract and to the restrictions of law." I cannot so read the deed, because it deprives the words "without the hindrance or interference" of the spouses, of all meaning. But these words must have a meaning, and that meaning I take to be, that the spouses reserve full power each to dispose of his or her whole estates without regard to any legal rights which might be claimed by the other.

I am also disposed to agree with your Lordship's construction of the fifth clause of the deed. So far as I have observed, that clause contains the only provision by way of settlement in the deed, the purpose of all the other clauses being to reserve entire the rights of each spouse over his or her own property; but by the fifth clause the husband settles a sum of £3000 on his wife to be paid to her after his death, and further settles certain furniture on her to be realised for her benefit, but only to the extent to which there may not be sufficient funds to meet the provision of £3000. The clause then goes on, "the condition and intent of the whole of this settlement being that the said Alice Katherine Reus shall receive the full sum of £3000 hereby settled upon her, but neither more nor less." I think the meaning of these words is that the wife is to get the sum of £3000, and that she is not to get, in any form or shape, more than £3000.

No. 209.

July 9, 1891.

Durrant Steuart's Trustees v. Durrant Steuart.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think that in cases of this kind it is desirable to keep in view the general object of marriage-contracts. A marriage-contract is a deed by which, in general, the contracting parties agree to substitute conventional provisions in place of those accruing by operation of law. Those cases in which the wife has been held entitled to her legal provisions over and above the conventional ones in her favour appear to me to proceed on the ground that the parties have omitted to give expression to their real intention in the deed rather than on the view that they deliberately resolved that the wife should be entitled to the benefit both of her legal and of her conventional provisions, for it is not easy to suppose that parties who have executed a deed intended to regulate their affairs during their marriage should at the same time intend that the provisions which the law makes in the absence of such a deed should also have full force and effect.

The deed which we have here to construe, although operative in Scotland, was prepared in a colony, and it is only by considering it in its general relations that its true meaning can be ascertained. In regard to solemnities,—and probably also in regard to the arrangement of the clauses,—the conveyancer who prepared it followed the system in force in the colony; but in the operative clauses, while he has made use of expressions some of which probably have a technical meaning according to the law in force in the colony, he has taken care—in accordance with the probable intention of the parties—to add general words wide enough to embrace technical words expressive of rights recognised by other systems, with the details of which he was unacquainted. I see traces of this precaution throughout the deed. Thus, in the first clause, it is provided that there shall be no community of property or of profit or loss between the intended consorts, but, in case this should not be sufficient, the clause goes on to provide that the rights of the parties in their respective properties should remain as if the marriage had not taken place. In the same way the latter part of clause 4 is really ancillary to the earlier portion of the clause. And, again, the purpose of the fifth clause was to settle a sum of £3000 on the wife, but in case there should be any doubt, the clause concludes with the general declaration,—"The condition and intent of the whole of this settlement being that the said Alice Katherine Reus shall receive the full sum of £3000 hereby settled upon her, but neither more nor less." Therefore, unless we are to hold that the jus relictæ cannot be excluded if it is not excluded by name, it is difficult to imagine a deed expressed in general terms which more clearly excludes that right than the present deed does.

In the case of Keith's Trustees, 19 D. 1040, Lord Deas expressed the opinion that general words might be sufficient to exclude the jus relictæ if the deed contained general words applicable to it, which the deed in that case, it was held, did not. That opinion is not opposed to the other authorities, and is, I think, founded on good sense. I think that words, if in their meaning applicable to the right in question, will be sufficient, if it appears from the whole scope and purpose of the deed that we are not extending the operation of the general words beyond the real intention of the parties. In this case I do not know whether the conveyancer who drew the deed was at all conversant with the phraseology of Scots law, but I think he was well advised in recommending the parties to make use of general words, rather than to attempt to use the particular words of Scots law, which would have expressed specifically the rights which I cannot doubt the parties had in view. I agree in thinking that this deed excludes the widow from all participation in her deceased husband's estate except to the extent of £3000.

No. 209.

July 9, 1891. Durrant Steuart's Trustees v. Durrant Steuart.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I agree in thinking that all we have to do is to ascertain the intention of the contracting parties by interpreting the language used according to the ordinary rules of construction. There is no rule of law that particular words must be used in order to produce the exclusion of the jus relictæ, and there is certainly no rule of law by which, although we may be satisfied of the intention of the parties in this respect, we are precluded from giving effect to that intention.

In this case I think that what the parties evidently intended was that the wife should have a certain sum of money, and no other claim against her husband's estate in consequence of the marriage. I think that the first and the fourth are the material clauses, and that the second and third clauses are ancillary. The first provides that each spouse is to be the uncontrolled proprietor of his or her own estate, just as if there had been no marriage; and the fourth clause that each is to have full power of disposing of their own property. I think that there is no room for doubt that the power to test reserved in the fourth clause necessarily refers to the same property as is reserved to the spouses in the first clause, and that the parties meant that nothing in the marriage was to prevent them disposing of their respective properties by will as if there had been no marriage. The suggestion pressed upon us to the contrary is, I think, untenable if we consider the effect of that argument, viz., that clause four was not intended by the spouses to define the property over which the power of each was to extend, but to secure their testamentary capacity over what they could by law dispose of. The fatal objection to that construction of the clause is, that there is no testamentary incapacity affecting a husband or a wife requiring to be removed, except the testamentary incapacity which arises from the existence of the legal rights, such as that now in question, and therefore I think that the hindrance or interference referred to in the fourth clause is the hindrance or interference which the exercise of these rights would have produced had the contract not excluded them.

I am therefore of opinion that these four clauses are enough for the decision of the case. But I entirely agree that the fifth clause hangs so well together with the others as to present a complete scheme of marriage-settlement, by which the wife should get £3000, neither more nor less, and nothing in addition which the law would have given her had there been no contract. It is satisfactory to observe that the contract, construed as your Lordships propose to construe it, provides just such a reasonable arrangement as the circumstances themselves would have suggested. It does not disappoint the wife of any reasonable expectation, looking to the amount of the estate and to the fact that there is a child of a former marriage. I see no reason therefore to regret the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—J. & A. F. ADAM, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN PATERSON AND ANOTHER (John Wyllie's Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers.—Ure.
JANE BOYD, Claimant (Reclaimer).—M'Kechnie—Craigie.
JAMES DICKIE (John Wyllie's Trustee), Claimant (Respondent).—R. V. Campbell—Lorimer.

No. 210.
July 10, 1891.
Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

Marriage-contract—Conveyance of property "now belonging or which shall belong to the husband at his death."—A conveyance by a husband to his marriage-contract trustees of all property "now belonging or which shall belong to him at the time of his decease," includes only property belonging to him at these dates respectively, and does not deprive him during his life of any right in or control over property acquired after the date of the contract, and such property will be liable for his debts.

Marriage-contract—"Property belonging to the husband"—Spes successionis.—A spes successionis belonging to a husband at the date of his marriage-contract held to be included in a conveyance to the trustees under the contract "of property now belonging to" him, as it appeared from the other parts of the deed that he intended so to convey it.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. C.

BY antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 20th October 1874, between James Wyllie, warehouseman, Glasgow, and Agnes Kerr, his intended wife, James Wyllie, on his part, disponed, assigned, conveyed, and made over to James Dickie, solicitor, Irvine, and others, as trustees, and to the survivors and survivor of them, "All and Sundry lands, houses, goods, gear, sums of money, effects, and property of every description, heritable and moveable, real and personal, now belonging, or which shall be belonging to him at the time of his decease, with the whole writs and title-deeds of the heritable property, and the vouchers and instructions of the moveable means and estate, and all that is competent to follow thereon, and without prejudice to the said generality," a certificate or policy of assurance effected by the said James Wyllie on his own life with the Scottish Provident Institution, "and the said James Wyllie has herewith delivered up the said certificate or policy of assurance, to be kept and used by the said trustees as their own proper writ and evident, and the said James Wyllie hereby binds and obliges himself to execute and deliver all writs and deeds necessary for making the above general and special conveyance effectual, but the same is granted for the ends, uses, and purposes following, viz., first, that the said trustees shall, after the death of the said James Wyllie, hold" certain heritable properties which belonged to his first wife, "and also the share to which he is entitled of the trust-estate of his late father, John Wyllie, innkeeper, Fullarton Arms, Fullarton Place, Irvine, and all sums of money which may at the time be in bank at Irvine in connection with the said properties or estate, for behoof of his only child by his former marriage," upon the terms and conditions therein specified; and, failing her and her issue, for behoof of the said Agnes Kerr and the issue of the said intended marriage; "Second, The said trustees shall hold the said policy of assurance and proceeds and produce thereof, with the whole household furniture and other means and effects, of whatever description the same may be, belonging to the said John Wyllie, after payment of all his debts and the expenses of executing the trust, for the liferent use allenarly of the said Agnes Kerr in case she shall happen to survive him, and for the child or children who may be procreated of the said intended marriage or of any other marriage which the said James Wyllie may afterwards enter into, equally among them in fee," on the terms and conditions mentioned in the deed. In consideration of which provisions in her favour, and on the other part, the said

No. 210.
July 10, 1891.
Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

Agnes Kerr thereby accepted the foresaid provisions in satisfaction of her legal rights; and further, she disponed and conveyed "all sums of money and property of every description, heritable and moveable, real and personal, now belonging to her, or which she may acquire by gift, mortis causa deed, or legal succession (but excepting always herefrom the provisions hereby made by the said James Wyllie, or to be made by him, in her favour), to and in favour of the said James Wyllie, in case he shall survive her, but in the event of his predeceasing her, the said whole property, heritable and moveable, which may belong to her, shall be subject to any disposition or division thereof which may be made by her among the children of the said intended marriage, and in the event of there being no such children, or of their failure by death without leaving lawful issue, then the same shall go to and be divided among her own lawful heirs or assignees whomsoever, but this conveyance by her to the said James Wyllie shall be subject always to the liferent use and enjoyment of the said Agnes Kerr, secluding therefrom the jus mariti, right of administration, and any other right of the said James Wyllie."

James Wyllie's father, John Wyllie mentioned above, died on 12th May 1872, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement. It was admitted by the parties to the action after mentioned that James Wyllie's interest under this settlement was a mere spes successionis at the date of his marriage-contract, but it was further admitted that, on 30th April 1890, he took a vested right.

On 15th May 1890 Jane Boyd, a creditor of James Wyllie under a bond and disposition in security, arrested the trust-funds in the hands of John Wyllie's trustees, and brought a furthcoming. They, in consequence, on 6th August 1890, brought the present action of multiplepoinding, calling as defenders Miss Boyd, James Dickie, as sole surviving accepting and acting trustee under James Wyllie's marriage-contract, and James Wyllie himself.

Claims were lodged by Miss Boyd and by Dickie.

Pleaded for Miss Boyd;—(2) The fund in medio having vested in, and being due and payable by the arrestees to the principal debtor at the date on which the claimant's arrestment was lodged, she is entitled to be ranked primo loco thereon in terms of her claim. (3) On a sound construction of the said antenuptial contract of marriage, the funds arrested are not conveyed thereby, and, separatim, not so conveyed as to defeat the arrestment of the claimant. (4) Said contract of marriage not having been on record, or duly and validly intimated to the real raisers in the present action, and, separatim, any intimation thereof having been made by a party or parties not in titulo to intimate it, the present claimant ought to be preferred and ranked in terms of her claim.

Pleaded for Dickie;—(1) The share of the estate of the said John Wyllie senior falling to the said James Wyllie under the foresaid trust-disposition and settlement, having been validly and effectually assigned by him to the trustees under the said antenuptial contract, and the said contract having been duly intimated, the right thereto is now vested in the claimant as the surviving and accepting trustee under that deed. (2) The pretended arrestment used by the said Jane Boyd in the hands of the trustees of the said deceased John Wyllie senior being posterior in date to the said antenuptial contract and intimations thereof, the same is inept and ineffectual, and did not attach or affect the foresaid share of the said estate, or any part thereof. (3) The claimant having exclusive right to the fund in medio as the surviving and accepting trustee under the said contract of marriage, he is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim.

No. 210.

July 10, 1891.
Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

A proof was allowed, the questions of fact in dispute being whether the trustees under the marriage-contract had ever truly accepted, and whether the marriage-contract had ever been intimated to the trustees under John Wyllie's settlement. The import of the proof on these questions will be found in the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

On 7th March 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the share of the estate of the deceased John Wyllie destined by his trust-disposition and settlement to his son James Wyllie was effectually assigned to the trustees under the contract of marriage of the said James Wyllie, dated 20th October 1874, and that the assignation thereof was intimated to the pursuers, John Wyllie's trustees, before the date of the arrestments founded on by the claimant Miss Jane Boyd: Finds that the claimant James Dickie is sole surviving trustee under the said marriage-contract: Therefore, ranks and prefers the said James Dickie, as trustee foresaid, in terms of his claims, and decerns: Finds the said Miss Jane Boyd liable in the expenses of the competition," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . The questions are (1) whether prior to her arrestment James Wyllie's interest in John Wyllie's estate had been effectually assigned to James Wyllie's marriage-contract trustees; and (2) whether, if so, that assignation was completed by intimation to John Wyllie's trustees before the date of the arrestment. If both these questions are answered in the affirmative, Miss Boyd's claim is excluded. If either were answered in the negative, she would be entitled to be preferred in terms of her claim.

"With regard to the former question it was contended (1) that James Wyllie's interest in his father's estate was not included in the conveyance to the trustees in the marriage-contract. The deed bears that James Wyllie conveyed all the effects then belonging to him, or which should belong to him at the time of his death. It was contended that this was not a conveyance of acquirenda, but a conveyance of the estate which belonged, or might belong, to James Wyllie at two specified dates, the date of the deed, and the date of his death,—and in support of that contention the case of Champion v. Duncan, 9th November 1867, 6 Macph. 17, was referred to. It was maintained that the share of John Wyllie's estate could not be carried as estate belonging to James Wyllie at the date of the marriage-contract, because his right to it had not then vested, nor as estate belonging to him at his death, because he was, and is still alive. I am inclined to regard the conveyance as equivalent to a conveyance of acquisita et acquirenda. The same words occurring in the marriage-contract under consideration in the case of Buchanan's Trustees v. Whyte, 25th February 1890, 17 R. (H. L.) 53, appear to have been so regarded. Still I think it would be difficult to hold that if this right was not carried at the date of the marriage-contract, it could be held to be carried at any later date, for instance at the date of vesting, and accordingly that was not maintained by the marriage-contract trustee, whose contention was that it was carried at the date of the marriage-contract, and I have come to think that contention well-founded.

"At that date it is true that James Wyllie had no vested right to any part of his father's estate. His interest in it was of the nature of a spes successionis. But it was not disputed that as such it was assignable.—Kirklands v. Kirkland's Trustee, 18th March 1886, 13 R. 798. An express assignation of a spes successionis would be effectual, and, when duly intimated, would place the assignee in the place of the cedent, entitled to be paid when the period of payment arrived. But in this case the spes successionis is not expressly mentioned. There is nothing but the general conveyance of the whole estate. That, I think, is capable of being construed as including a spes successionis, but could not, in my opinion, be held to do so according to its ordinary and primary import; and, accordingly, if the question depended on the words of the conveyance to the

No. 210.
July 10, 1891.
Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

Miss Boyd reclaimed, and argued;—The spes successionis which James Wyllie had at the date of his marriage-contract was not carried by the trustees alone, I would have held that James Wyllie's share in his father's estate was not included.

"But the marriage-contract trustee referred, and I think legitimately, to the purposes of the trust. It is provided by the first purpose that the trustees are to hold certain heritable property specified, and 'also the share to which he (James Wyllie) is entitled of the trust-estate of his late father, John Wyllie,' for the purposes specified; and by the second purpose it is provided that they are to hold a policy of insurance effected with the Scottish Provident Institution, which is specially conveyed, and the proceeds of it, with the household furniture, 'and other means and effects of whatever description the same may be, belonging to the said James Wyllie,' for the said Agnes Kerr in liferent, and the children of the marriage in fee.

"It was argued, and I think rightly, that these provisions shew that James Wyllie intended to convey his share in his father's estate to his marriage-contract trustees, and meant to include that share under the general terms of the conveyance, either in the knowledge that his interest was only a spes successionis, or, what seems more likely, because he supposed that he had, or might have, a vested interest in it. In either case it appears to me that the conveyance of the whole effects belonging to him at that date would carry his interest in his father's estate, whatever it might be, if his intention that it should be so carried sufficiently appears from the deed itself. On the whole, on this point I think that the contention of the marriage-contract trustee, that James Wyllie's share in his father's estate was meant to be included, and was included, in the general conveyance to the marriage-contract trustees in the contract, is well founded.

"But it was contended (2) that the conveyance to the trustees was really as yet wholly ineffectual, because it was entirely testamentary and inoperative until the death of James Wyllie, the truster. I think there is difficulty about this point also, but I have come to the conclusion that it was intended to be operative from its date, and that the trust-disposition in the contract is not testamentary only. It has of course, like every marriage-contract, provisions regulating the succession to the estates; but the peculiarity which, as it appears to me, most favours the argument that the trust-conveyance is only testamentary is this, that there seem to be no trust purposes at all during James Wyllie's life. It is provided by the first purpose that the trustees shall after his death hold the heritable subjects specified, and the share of his father's estate, for the purposes specified. They are not directed or empowered to hold for him at all—in liferent, or fee, or otherwise—nor are they expressly directed to hold for anyone during his life. This strikes one as a singular peculiarity in a marriage-contract. But notwithstanding this peculiarity, I think that the deed must be regarded as being what it bears to be, a deed coming into operation and having effect from its date. It is expressed in words of de præsenti conveyance. The conveyance of Agnes Kerr's estate is not to trustees, but directly to James Wyllie, and there is no reason to question its immediate effect. The trust-conveyance comprehends, besides the general estate, a policy of insurance on James Wyllie's life. This is conveyed to the trustees by the same words which convey the general estate, and in reference to it the deed bears that James Wyllie 'has delivered up the said certificate or policy of assurance to be kept and used by the said trustees, as their own proper writ and evident.' It is difficult to hold that the policy did not pass immediately by the conveyance, and difficult to hold that, if it did, the same words of conveyance would not carry James Wyllie's whole estate. Considering the deed as a whole, I am of opinion that the conveyance to trustees was, according to its sound construction, a conveyance inter vivos which included James Wyllie's share in his father's estate. Analogous questions arose in the case of Buchanan's Trustees v. Whyte, where provisions in a marriage-contract, which were held in this Court to be testamentary, were held in the House of Lords to be operative from the date of the deed.

"(3) It was contended that the deed was ineffectual because undelivered. This

No. 210.
July 10, 1891.
Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

conveyance in that contract. It was not specifically conveyed, and in this respect was in marked contrast with the policy of insurance, which argument was pressed somewhat anxiously, but I feel some doubt whether I have correctly apprehended it, because the deed is an onerous bipartite contract, effectual according to its true extent without delivery. Besides, I apprehend that intimation would operate as delivery.—M'Lurgs v. Blackwood, 28th February 1680, M. 845, where an assignation intimated, but otherwise undelivered, was preferred to an arrestment. This question is therefore involved in the second general question, whether the assignation has been completed by intimation to John Wyllie's trustees.

"(4) It was contended that the trust in the marriage-contract never came into operation or existence at all, and was a mere unreality or pretence. To this point the proof has in part been directed, and the result is easily expressed.

"There were three trustees nominated, of whom two are dead, and James Dickie is the sole survivor. There was no written acceptance or meeting of trustees, no sederunt of the trust, no entry about that trust in Mr Dickie's books as agent of the trust. Nothing whatever was done in it unless it were the intimations after referred to. The reason was, as Mr Dickie explained, that the trustees had no duties and nothing to do during James Wyllie's life.

"Mr Dickie depones that he prepared the marriage-contract on the instructions of James Wyllie, that one of the trustees—John Wyllie, the truster's brother—had expressed his willingness to act, and that he had reason to believe that the other trustee was communicated with by James Wyllie, who, however, has not been examined as a witness, I hardly know why. This is certainly a singular state of matters, but I do not see that the deed would be inoperative, even if no trustees accepted. Whether a difficulty would arise as to intimation is a different question.

"But, seeing that Mr Dickie prepared the marriage-contract as James Wyllie's agent, I am disposed to think that, in the circumstances, his acceptance of the trust is to be presumed, and that he is entitled to hold himself forth as a trustee, and as now the sole remaining trustee, under the marriage-contract, as he is now doing.

"On these grounds, I answer in the affirmative this first question, Whether James Wyllie's share in his father's estate was effectually conveyed to his marriage-contract trustees?

"The second question is, Whether this conveyance was completed by intimation to John Wyllie's trustees before the date of Miss Boyd's arrestments?

"There is annexed to the marriage-contract a docquet, dated 25th February 1875, signed by the secretary of the Scottish Provident Institution, acknowledging intimation of the contract. The docquet does not state by whom the intimation was made, but Mr Dickie depones that he made it on behalf of the trustees under the marriage-contract. He does not say that he got any instructions from anyone to do so. There is an entry about it in Mr Dickie's ledger under the name of Mr James Wyllie, and I rather think that he considered that his instructions to prepare the marriage-contract included authority to make the assignations in it effectual by the necessary intimations, and if he thought so, I think that in the circumstances of this case he was right.

"It was not expressly maintained by Miss Boyd's counsel that the intimation to the insurance company was ineffectual. It is true that he had no concern with that intimation, but his argument seems to infer that it was inept. But I understand that such an acknowledgment by the debtor of intimation is probably the most ordinary way in which intimation is effected, and by which the debtor is interpelled from paying to the cedent, or to anyone in his right, and by which the assignee is effectually put in place of the cedent. Newton Company v. Callogan & Company, 23d November 1785, M. 850; Menzies' Lectures, 257.

"There are two entries in the sederunt-book of John Wyllie's trust which are referred to as proving intimation of the marriage-contract to John Wyllie's trustees. The one is dated 1st March 1875. It is averred in the record that the intimation was made by 'James Dickie, as agent for the trustees under was specifically mentioned in the dispositive clause; nor was it conveyed generically as a right of succession, and in that respect the conveyance on the wife's side was in contrast with it. It was conveyed only if a spes successionis could be described as "property now belonging" to Wyllie. But a spes successionis was not in any accurate sense "property," —it was not attachable by creditors,[1]—nor could it be accurately described "as now belonging to" anyone. The Lord Ordinary had interpreted the the marriage-contract, of whom he was one,' and the acknowledgment bears to be by James Dickie, as agent for the trustees of John Wyllie.

No. 210. July 10, 1891. Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

---

"The sederunt-book of John Wyllie's trust seems to have been irregularly kept, and this entry appears to be somewhat out of its proper date. A great part of the evidence is devoted to an attempt to expiscate this irregularity, quite idly, I humbly think, because nothing turns on the exact date of this intimation, or of the entry, and I see nothing whatever suspicious about it. It is said, however, that this intimation was never communicated to John Wyllie's trustees. I do not think it necessary to inquire into this point, because the marriage-contract trustee points to another minute, dated 3d October 1889, which bears that the agent directed attention to the prior entry, and proceeds, —"This entry had not been referred to since Mr Orr was assumed a trustee, and it was now brought to his knowledge, so that the intimation to the trustees may be complete.' This minute is signed by Mr Orr and Mr Paterson, then the surviving trustees of John Wyllie. The minute bears that a copy of the marriage-contract had been deposited with the papers of John Wyllie's trust.

"It thus appears that, at all events at 3d October 1889, which is early enough for the case of the marriage-contract trustee, the marriage-contract had been formally brought under the notice of John Wyllie's trustees.

"It was contended that there could be no effectual intimation, because there were no trustees of James Wyllie who could make the intimation. But I do not concur in that argument. It is not essential that the intimation shall be by the assignee. Reference was made to the case of A v. B, 25th January 1540, M. 843, in which it was expressly decided that intimation by the cedent was sufficient, although there had been no intimation by the assignee; and I may notice that the statutory schedule of a notarial intimation appended to the Transmission of Moveable Property Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 85), does not bear on whose behalf the notary acted. Besides, I do not see any sufficient reason for denying to Mr Dickie the character of a trustee under James Wyllie's marriage-contract, and if he was a trustee, he was in 1889 the sole surviving trustee.

"I cannot distinguish between the intimation to the Scottish Provident Institution and the intimation to John Wyllie's trustees.

"If I could hold that at the date of these intimations there was no trustee under the marriage-contract trust, there might be a difficulty of another kind, because it might be said that there was no assignee who could take in the place of the cedent. I think that any such difficulty might be overcome, but it does not arise if I am right in holding that James Dickie was a trustee.

"It appears to me therefore that the effect of the conveyance and the intimation has been to place Mr Dickie, as sole trustee under James Wyllie's marriage-contract, as the creditor of John Wyllie's trustees, to whom they became bound to pay the share of the estate destined to James Wyllie when that share vested and was payable—that is, on 30th April 1890.

"It follows that Miss Boyd's claim, which is founded on the assumption that John Wyllie's trustees are debtors of James Wyllie and not of James Wyllie's marriage-contract trustees, falls to be repelled, and that these trustees are entitled to be preferred.

"It does not follow from this judgment that James Wyllie's estate has been placed beyond the reach of his creditors by the marriage-contract. No question of that kind has been argued or could have been raised in this case. I am only anxious to make it clear that I do not indicate any opinion on that point."

[1] Trappes v. Meredith, Nov. 3, 1871, 10 Macph. 38, 44 Scot. Jur. 25.

words of conveyance by reference to the purposes of the deed. But the first purpose, which was the one referred to, did not deal with a spes successionis, but with a "share" of Wyllie's father's estate; and necessarily so, because if Wyllie died before the interest, which at the date of the marriage was merely in spe, became vested in him, nothing would pass to the trustees or to Mrs Wyllie, and it was the assumption of this, as of the second purpose of the deed, that Wyllie should have died before it became operative. Obviously, therefore, the first purpose dealt with a vested right, not a spes. No doubt the conveyance was also of all property which should belong to Wyllie at his death, but it was settled that such words did not exclude the diligence of the husband's creditors as regarded property acquired by him after the date of the contract,[1] and an interest which, although it may have belonged to him at the date of the contract, had not been conveyed to him at that date, was plainly, in this respect, in the same position as property subsequently acquired by him. But admitting that the conveyance in point of form included this spes successionis, the conveyance was truly illusory; or rather, although it was in point of expression per verba de præsenti, it was in reality intended to have no operative effect until the dissolution of the marriage. The trustees had no duties whatever until then, and they would have no duties at all if Wyllie survived his wife and daughter, for the wife's conveyance was to him direct in the event of his surviving her. They were not even directed to pay the liferent of his estate to Wyllie. The real meaning of the contract was that until the dissolution of the marriage each spouse should remain dominus of his or her estate, which consequently remained open to the diligence of creditors, notwithstanding the formal conveyance to trustees.[2] At anyrate, the first purpose, that which was said to deal with the spes successionis, was testamentary only, not pactional, for the primary object of that purpose was a child of Wyllie by a former marriage.[3] Further, the marriage-contract trust had never come into existence —none of the trustees had accepted, not even Dickie, who truly had done nothing except prepare the deed. No doubt it might come into existence by the trustees accepting now, but the possibility of its existence was no bar to the diligence of creditors. Lastly, there had been no intimation to John Wyllie's trustees of the assignation to the marriage-contract trustees. It had not been proved that intimation had been made in point of fact, and, secondly, the marriage-contract trust being non-existent at the date of the alleged intimation, there was no assignee to take the place of the cedent.

The argument for Dickie sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Kinnear.[4]

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The first question we have to consider in this case is, whether the share of the estate of the deceased John Wyllie was effectually assigned to the trustees under James Wyllie's contract of marriage. And upon that question I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

James Wyllie was entitled to a certain share of his father's estate, but the parties are agreed that the right did not vest until the 30th April 1890. James [1] Champion v. Duncan, Nov. 9, 1867, 6 Macph. 17, 40 Scot. Jur. 17.

[2] Grant v. Robertson, June 15, 1872, 10 Macph. 804, 44 Scot. Jur. 547.
[3] Costine's Trustees v. Costine, March 19, 1878, 5 R. 782, March 20, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 13.
[4] Additional authority.—Forrest v. Robertson's Trustees, Oct. 27, 1876, 4 R. 22.

No. 210.
July 10, 1891.
Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

Wyllie's marriage-contract was executed in 1874, while the right was still in spe, but it is settled law that an expectancy of this kind may be effectually assigned so as to give a valid title to the assignee when the right comes to be vested. The only question therefore is, whether upon the construction of this marriage-contract there is an effectual assignation of the expectant right in question? Now, the husband by the terms of the marriage-contract assigns and conveys to the trustees the real and personal property of every description now belonging or which shall belong to him at the time of his decease. I cannot say that I altogether agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that that is a conveyance of acquisita et acquirenda in the ordinary technical signification of these words, because that would mean that the husband had given the marriage-contract trustees not only everything of which he was possessed at the date of the contract, and everything in addition which he might leave behind him at his death, but also anything which he might acquire in any manner of way during the intermediate period between the marriage and his death, so as to deprive himself of all right of property and all power of control over other property that might come to him during that intermediate period. I do not think that is the meaning of the conveyance. It is said that these words, which are of not infrequent occurrence, have a technical meaning in our law, but it appears to me that although their significance is perfectly well fixed, it is simply the natural meaning of the words, as words of ordinary language, and when the marriage-contract settles everything now belonging to him and also everything that shall belong to him at his death—he conveys exactly what he says—the property that belongs to him at the date of the contract and also what shall be found to belong to him at his death, but he does not deprive himself of any right of property or power of control in subjects he may acquire after the date of the marriage-contract during his lifetime, and accordingly the property which belongs to him at his death and which he has acquired after the date of the marriage-contract will be subject to all the debts which he may have contracted during his lifetime. Therefore it is quite indispensable that we should consider in this case whether the spes successionis now in question is carried to the marriage-contract trustees under the description of property belonging to the husband at the date of the contract, or only under the description of the property which shall be found to belong to him at the date of his death, because if the latter were the true construction of the words, then it would be impossible to sustain the right of the marriage-contract trustees in the meantime to carry off the fund to the exclusion of the husband's creditors.

Now, that appears to me to be a question of construction which must be considered by the ordinary rules for construing a contract. It is said that the words "property now belonging to me" cannot cover any interest which is not vested at the time the granter of the deed is supposed to be speaking. It appears to me that the words are words of ordinary language, and are quite effectual to cover any interest of the kind which it appears, upon the construction of the whole contract, and of this clause taken with the context, the party intended them to convey. Now, it is clear enough that the husband in this case supposed himself to be dealing with his interest in his father's succession as a right which he was entitled to dispose of, and in that respect he was perfectly right, because although it could not become finally vested in him until his survivance at a particular date, still it was a right which was undoubtedly subject to disposal. Reading the purposes to which the trustees are to assign the subjects conveyed to them, it would appear to me that the natural inference from the words employed in that clause is that the husband did intend to convey this particular right, because when he comes to direct the trustees as to what they are to do with the subjects assigned to them, he says, first, that the said trustees shall, after the death of the said James Wyllie, hold certain properties, which undoubtedly belonged to him at the time—heritable properties—and also the share to which he was entitled of the trust-estate of his late father, for certain purposes expressed, and therefore he begins by tying up these two properties together—his right of succession to his father's estate, which he assumes he is entitled to convey, and the property which did undoubtedly belong to him. But then it is said—and it is a point that requires consideration—that when he goes on to tell his trustees what they are to do with the property conveyed to them, it is clear enough that he does not contemplate that anything is to be done with it until after his death, and therefore it is said it cannot be supposed that he could make an immediate conveyance of it to his trustees at all. The trust purposes are that they are to hold these two estates together for behoof of his daughter, and to give her the income so long as she shall be in minority after his death, and then, upon her majority or marriage, to settle the fee upon her under certain conditions; and in the event of her dying without leaving children, or the issue of such children before receiving a conveyance of these properties, then to hold the properties in question for behoof of his second wife, with whom he was making this contract of marriage. The only importance of that consideration is as an indication of intention to postpone the conveyance until the death of the husband.

No. 210.

July 10, 1891.
Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

If the intention to make an immediate assignation during his life is clearly expressed, then no practical difficulty arises from the limitation of the trust purposes to a period occurring after his death, because it is a settled doctrine of the law that where funds are put in trust for limited and defined purposes which do not exhaust the fund, the unexhausted portion results to the granter of the trust and his representatives, and therefore if the husband in this case intended to assign his share of his father's succession to the trustees by an immediately effectual conveyance, and yet told them only how they were to dispose of it in favour of his daughter or his wife after his death, there would necessarily arise a resulting trust for him so far as regards the income accruing from the estate during his lifetime. The point which is here made upon this peculiarity of the trust is certainly, as I have said, one that requires consideration, but I think the inference which might otherwise have been drawn from it is entirely displaced when one reads the whole purposes of the trust together, because when the first purpose and the second are read together it is perfectly clear that the truster intended that the two estates which he places together under the trust are to be treated as separate and distinct subjects, to be kept free from any debts he may contract during his life, and that the rest of his property which is to come to his trustees at his death under the conveyance of what shall then belong to him is to be the only property which will remain in his own hands subject to debts contracted by him during his life. I think that is clear enough. In the first place, he begins by making a specific direction that the trustees shall hold—that is, of course, from the moment of the assignation to them becoming effectual—the two properties which he specially mentions, and then he goes on to say that the trustees are to hold a certain policy of insurance and the proceeds and produce thereof, and the whole other means and effects of whatsoever description which may belong to James Wyllie after payment of his debts and the expenses of the trust; and therefore it seems to me to be clear that he makes a de præsenti assignation of two estates,—the estate which belongs to him at the time of the contract, including his expectant right in his father's estate, to become immediately effectual and free from any power of control or interference of his, and another estate,—whatever belongs to him at the date of his death, including the policy of insurance, which will remain in his hands subject to the debts he may contract during his life.

No. 210.

July 10, 1891.
Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

I therefore agree entirely with the Lord Ordinary in the conclusion at which he has arrived as to the meaning and effect of the marriage-contract; but there are a number of other points which have been raised, which his Lordship considers very minutely and carefully in his opinion, upon the effect of this contract, assuming it to bear the interpretation which he puts upon it. It is said, in the first place, that it has never been delivered, and I think the Lord Ordinary's answer to that is quite conclusive, because a mutual contract requires no delivery. But then it appears to have been argued, and it was also argued before us, that upon other grounds it was ineffectual as an assignation. It was said that the trustees had never accepted, and, as the Lord Ordinary puts it, that the trust was really never effectual upon that ground. Now, it does not appear to me necessary to consider at all the various grounds upon which the Lord Ordinary, quite satisfactorily, I think, meets that argument, because there is one point which is very conclusive. It is of no consequence that the trustees accepted the trust so committed them, because it is quite certain the surviving trustee has now accepted it, and makes this claim in the performance of his duty for the purpose of making it effectual, and I cannot see how the question of the time at which the trust may have been accepted previously to the institution of this action has any bearing at all upon the question of its validity and effect now that we know that the trustees are seeking to enforce it. But then a third point remains, because it is contended for the reclaimers that although the trust is effectual the assignation to the trustees cannot prevail against the other claimants' arrestments, because it has never been duly intimated. Upon that question also it appears to me that there are a good many points which have been suggested as points of difficulty, and which the Lord Ordinary deals with, which really create no difficulty at all. It is quite sufficient, as his Lordship points out, that the sederunt-book of John Wyllie's trust bears that the attention of the trustees had been directed by the agent to a certain previous intimation, so that it might now be brought to the knowledge of a new trustee that the assignation in question had been intimated, and in order that that intimation might be complete. I am speaking of course of the trustees of the deceased John Wyllie, who were the debtors in this obligation, which was to be made effectual by intimation to them of James Wyllie's assignation of his right as against them. I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary in what he has said upon that question, and I am therefore of opinion that the claim of the trustees in respect of an assignation which has been duly intimated has been rightly sustained by his Lordship.

Their claim, or rather the claim of the sole surviving trustee, is of course to hold the money for the purposes of the trust, and that is so expressed. No question was raised before us as to the right of the arresting creditor to any portion of the estate except the entire fee or capital of the right of succession, and therefore no question of that kind appears to arise, but it may be well to observe that nothing that is done by this judgment can affect in any way the right of the husband's creditors to the income coming due to him during his life. Of course the ground upon which we proceed is this,—that he has effectually conveyed the fund to trustees for certain purposes, but that one trust purpose is during his own lifetime to make good the income of the estate to himself.

No. 210.
July 10, 1891.
Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—JAMES RUSSELL, S.S.C.—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

GENERAL JAMES CLERK RATTRAY AND ANOTHER (Sir James and Lady Stewart Richardson's Trustees), Petitioners.—Sym.
JOHN RANKINE, Compearer.—Cosens.

No. 211.
July 11, 1891.
Richardson's Trustees.

Writ—Authentication—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 39.—The testing-clause of a recorded disposition of heritage bore, inter alia, that the disposition had been subscribed by Hugh James Rollo (one of the granters) "before these witnesses, William Robertson, apprentice, and John Alexander James, clerk, both to me, the said Hugh James Rollo." The subscription of one of the witnesses to what bore to be Rollo's subscription was "William Roberton, witness." A proof, allowed in a petition under the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, established that William Roberton, apprentice to Rollo, had attested Rollo's subscription by subscribing the words "William Roberton, witness," appearing on the disposition in question. Held that, the discrepancy between "Robertson" and "Roberton" was an informality of execution within the meaning of the 39th section of the Act, that that section therefore applied, and, looking to the proof, that the petition fell to be granted.

THIS was an application for a declarator under sec. 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874,* presented in the following circumstances, as appearing from the petition:— 1ST DIVISION. C.

By disposition and conveyance dated 27th November and 7th December 1874, and 10th March 1875, Sir James Horn Burnett, of Leys, and Hugh James Rollo, W.S., the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Dean Ramsay, disponed and conveyed certain heritable subjects in Ainslie Place, Edinburgh, to the trustees under the marriage-contract of Sir James Stewart Richardson, of Pitfour, and Lady Richardson. The testing-clause of the disposition bore, inter alia, that the deed was subscribed "by me, the said Hugh James Rollo, at Edinburgh, the 10th day of March 1875 years, before these witnesses, William Robertson, apprentice,

* The Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 39, enacts,—"No deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution; but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall lie upon the party using or upholding the same; and such proof may be led in any action or proceeding in which such deed, instrument, or writing is founded on or objected to, or in a special application to the Court of Session, or to the Sheriff within whose jurisdiction the defender in any such application resides, to have it declared that such deed, instrument, or writing was subscribed by such granter or maker and witnesses."

No. 211.

July 11, 1891.
Richardson's Trustees.

and John Alexander James, clerk, both to me, the said James Rollo." The subscription of one of the witnesses to the signature of Mr Rollo was "William Roberton, witness," as to the other there was no dispute. Richardson's trustees having sold the subjects conveyed to them, the purchaser objected to the title offered in consequence of the discrepancy between the surname "Robertson" in the testing-clause, and the surname "Roberton" in the signature; and the present application was accordingly presented by Richardson's trustees. Sir James Burnett and Mr Rollo were both dead by this time.

A proof was allowed.*

Argued for the petitioners;—It might be that had this case occurred before the Conveyancing Act of 1874, the present objection would have been fatal to the deed, because it might be said that there was a substantial variance between the name in the testing-clause and the name subscribed.[1] It was, however, nothing more than an informality of execution; the case therefore was within the Act, and the proof having established that William Roberton had in fact subscribed as instrumentary witness to Mr Rollo's signature, the petition ought to be granted.[2]

Cosens appeared for Mr John Rankine, the purchaser, and stated that he did not desire to offer any argument.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As no argument was offered to us on behalf of the purchaser, we may take it that he is quite satisfied with the title offered, if he has a declarator by the Court in terms of the Act. I have no doubt that the Act applies to a case like the present, and looking to the evidence, I think that we should grant the declaration prayed for.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the petitioner has proved that this deed was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom it bears to be attested. That being proved in point of fact, the Act says that the Court may declare that the deed was subscribed by such granter or maker and witnesses. I am therefore disposed to think that the case falls within the Act. The objection which has been stated is a very technical one. It is, that the Act was intended to remedy informalities of execution only, and that what we have here to deal with is not an informality of execution but a discrepancy—a discrepancy between the signature of one of the witnesses and the statement of his name in the testing-clause. It is therefore said that the Act does not apply. Now, I do not think that is a substantial objection. If there had been no testing-clause at all, the petitioner would have

* William Roberton deponed that he had been in the office of Mr Rollo in 1875,—"I remember generally the disposition being sent to Sir James H. Burnett, and coming back to Mr Rollo. I knew Mr Rollo's signature well. I signed as one of the instrumentary witnesses to Mr Rollo's signature. The subscription, 'Wm. Roberton, witness,' is mine. It was appended by me at the time Mr Rollo executed the disposition, which he did in my presence. I produce the draft of the deed having the instructions of the testing-clause. My name is properly spelt in the directions for filling up the deed. The schedule of directions, so far as applicable to Mr Rollo's signature, was filled up by me. There was no William Robertson in Mr Rollo's office at that time."

John Alexander James corroborated the evidence of this witness.

[1] M'Dougall v. M'Dougall, June 15, 1875, 2 R. 814, per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, at p. 821.

[2] M'Laren v. Menzies, July 20, 1876, 3 R. 1151; Addison, Feb. 23, 1875, 2 R. 457; Thomson's Trustees v. Easson, Nov. 2, 1878, 6 R. 141.

No. 211.
July 11, 1891.
Richardson's Trustees.

been entitled to take advantage of the Act, and I do not see now how he can be in a worse position by reason of its being a mistake in the testing-clause.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a remedial statute. In the absence therefore of any clearly limitative words, it must be interpreted so as to make the remedy co-extensive with the mischief which it is intended to remedy. Two different cases may be figured. The first is where the granter of the deed is himself looking after the due execution of the deed—in that case he will himself take care that the testing-clause is properly filled in. But the other, and by far the more common case occurs where the deed is presented by the granter's solicitor for signature, and is taken away by him after it has been subscribed, so that it is never seen by the granter after he has subscribed it. Everything has been done so far as the granter is concerned, yet, under the operation of our older law, the deed might have been annulled, if there had been a failure to supply a testing-clause. The statute applies to remedy the evil resulting from the omission of a testing-clause, and I can see no reason why it should not also apply to the case of a blundered testing-clause. It seems to me that a blundered testing-clause is an informality of execution within the meaning of the Act, assuming that a blunder such as we have here would have invalidated the deed at common law.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree. I cannot see any reason to doubt that the statute applies to the present case.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Declare that the said disposition and conveyance was subscribed by the said Sir James Horn Burnett [the interlocutor then set forth the portion of the testing-clause as to which there was no dispute], and by the said Hugh James Rollo, at Edinburgh, the 10th day of March 1875 years, before these witnesses—William Roberton, apprentice, and John Alexander James, clerk, both to the said Hugh James Rollo, being the witnesses by whom the said disposition and conveyance bears to be attested: Further, grant warrant to the Keeper of the General Register of Sasines to record in said register the declaration now granted."

COVENTRY & ROBERTON, W.S.—ROMANES & SIMSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 212.
July 14, 1891.
Adamson's Trustees v. Adamson's Executors.

DAVID FAIRWEATHER AND OTHERS (Adamson's Trustees), First Parties.—Macfarlane—Graham Stewart.
DAVID FAIRWEATHER AND OTHERS (Adamson's Executors), Second Parties.—Macfarlane—Graham Stewart.
MRS ELIZABETH M. FAIRWEATHER OR ADAMSON, Third Party.—Guthrie.
MRS ELIZABETH THOMSON OR ADAMSON, Fourth Party.—Shaw—Salvesen.
DAVID FAIRWEATHER AND OTHERS (John Adamson's Tutors and Curators), Fifth Parties.—Macfarlane—Graham Stewart.

Succession—Will—Revocation—Conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit.—Held that the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit did not apply to a will in respect (1) that it was executed by the testator in the knowledge that his wife was pregnant, and (2) that it was not a general disposition disposing of the universitas of his estate.

Succession—Annuity—Preference.—A testator left to his wife an annuity of £400, and to his mother, "if my estate will permit," an annuity of £100. He left no other testamentary provision. Held that both annuities were payable out of capital, but that the annuity to the wife was preferable to that of the mother.

Succession—Partnership—Payment of profits, so far as necessary, to execu-

No. 212.
July 14, 1891.
Adamson's Trustees v. Adamson's Executors.

tors of deceased partner for behoof of widow and children.—A contract of copartnery provided that if either of the two partners should die during the continuance of the partnership "leaving a widow, child, or children" surviving him, the surviving partner should, for a period of six months from the date of the deceased partner's death, pay to the latter's executors, "for the benefit of his widow, child, or children, the share of profits to which the said deceased partner would have been entitled had he lived."

One of the partners having died leaving a widow and one child, held that the share of the profits payable under the contract of copartnership did not form part of the deceased partner's executry estate, but fell to be equally divided between his wife and child.

2D DIVISION. C.

BY antenuptial contract of marriage, executed in Scotland in 1889, John Adamson, of the British India Steam Navigation Company at Negapatam, bound himself to pay to his wife, in the event of her surviving him, a free liferent alimentary annuity of £200. He also bound himself to pay to her certain sums for furniture and mournings. In security of these obligations Mr Adamson conveyed certain estate to the trustees to be held by them, inter alia, for securing and paying the foresaid annuity and other provisions for his wife, if she should survive him, and subject to these purposes, the trustees were to hold the capital of the trust funds for behoof of the child or children of the marriage. The wife on her part made certain provisions. The deed further contained this clause,—"And which provision by the said John Adamson, hereinbefore written, in favour of the said Elizabeth Mary Fairweather, she hereby accepts as in full of all terce of lands, half or third of moveables, and every other claim or provision which she could by law ask or demand upon his death if she survive him: And further, the provisions before written in favour of the child or children of the marriage are hereby declared by the contracting parties to be in full satisfaction to all and each of such child or children of all legitim, executry, bairns' part of gear, and everything else he, she, or they could claim upon the death of the said John Adamson and Elizabeth Mary Fairweather, or either of them, excepting only their goodwill; and that the said issue may succeed to them, or either of them, in any estate or property at their or his or her disposal at death, and not otherwise disposed of."

Mr Adamson died on 19th May 1890 survived by his wife and mother. At the time of his death there were no children of the marriage, but a posthumous child, John Adamson, was born on 15th August 1890.

Mr Adamson left a will, dated 21st May 1889, which was in the following terms:—"I, John Adamson, residing in Negapatam, considering that by marriage-contract I have provided for my wife, Mrs Elizabeth Mary Fairweather or Adamson, in case she shall survive me, a free yearly annuity of £200 sterling per annum, and now, for certain good causes, I desire to make a farther provision for her, in the event of her surviving me, I hereby by these presents leave and bequeath to her a farther sum of £200 sterling per annum, and that in addition to above mentioned provision and all others narrated in our marriage-contract: I desire also and do by these presents leave and bequeath to my mother, Mrs Elizabeth Thomson or Adamson, in case she shall survive me, a free liferent use of Clydesdale Cottage, Brechin, presently occupied by her, with the whole furniture therein belonging to me, and in addition thereto, if my estate will permit, a free yearly annuity of £100 sterling as long as she shall live," &c.

At the time of his death Mr Adamson was in partnership with Mr Henry Mactaggart under a contract of copartnership, dated 1st January 1887, by the 22d article of which it was provided as follows:—"If either

No. 212.
July 14, 1891.
Adamson's Trustees v. Adamson's Executors.

f the said partners shall die during the continuance of the said partnership leaving a widow, child, or children him surviving, the surviving artner shall, for a period of six months from the date of decease of said artner, pay to the executors or administrators of said deceased partner, or the benefit of the widow, child, or children, the share of profits to which he said deceased partner would have been entitled had he lived (in addition to the monies to which they will be entitled under article twentieth)" i.e., the share to which the deceased partner would be entitled out of the artnership effects at the winding-up of the partnership], "such payment o be made as soon after the expiry of the six months from the date of lecease of said partner as a proper account can be made up."

After Mr Adamson's death doubts arose as to the true effect and neaning of the settlements and as to the legal distribution of his estate.

A special case was accordingly presented to the Court by (1) the marriage-contract trustees, (2) the executors under the will, (3) Mr Adamson's widow, (4) his mother, and (5) the tutors and curators of his posthumous son.

The following statements appeared in the case:—"At the date when the said will was executed the third party was pregnant, and was known by her husband to be so. She was delivered prematurely of still-born twin children on 21st August 1889. . . . Mr Adamson's domicile at the time of his marriage was in Scotland, and it continued so until his death. . . . Mr Adamson's estate, with the exception of the house called Clydesdale Cottage, mentioned in the will of 21st May 1889, is entirely moveable. The estate conveyed in trust by the marriage-contract, and now held by the trustees, amounts, after deducting the widow's claims for mournings and furniture, to about £5200, and is thus barely sufficient to meet the expenses of management and the annuity therein provided to the third party. The testamentary estate is almost wholly situated in India, and has not yet been realised. It is estimated at the present rate of exchange to amount to about £7500, and it is thus doubtful whether it will be sufficient to meet out of income the annuities in favour of the third and fourth parties provided by said will. The value of Clydesdale Cottage is estimated at £650."

The following questions were put:—"3. Is the will of 21st May 1889 revoked by the birth of said child? 4. In the event of the third question being answered in the negative, do the annuities thereby provided in favour of Mr Adamson's widow and mother rank pari passu, or is the annuity in favour of his widow preferable; and are either or both of said annuities payable only out of income, or, if that prove insufficient, may they or either of them be paid out of capital? 5. Do said profits of copartnership form part of the deceased's general executry estate; or do they fall to be divided between the third and fifth parties, and if so in what proportions? 6. In the event of the third question being answered in the negative, and of its being held that part of said profits fall to be paid to the third party, does said part fall to be attributed pro tanto towards payment of the annuity provided for the third party by the will of 21st May 1889?"

Argued for the fifth parties;—The conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit came into operation upon the birth of the child, and its effect was absolutely to revoke the will.[1] No doubt in the earlier cases such as Yule v. Yule[2] there were dicta to the effect that the presumption arising

[1] Colquhoun v. Campbell, June 5, 1829, 7 S. 709, 1 Scot. Jur. 248; Dobie's Trustee v. Pritchard, Oct. 19, 1887, 15 R. 2; Munro's Executors v. Munro, Nov. 18, 1890, 18 R. 122.

[2] Yule v. Yule, Dec. 20, 1758, M. 6400.

No. 212.
July 14, 1891.
Adamson's Trustees v. Adamson's Executors.

from the conditio might be rebutted where two elements concurred, viz.:—(1) Where the testator survived the birth of his child for a sufficiently long time; and (2) where his settlement was only a partial one, and did not dispose of a substantial portion of his estate. It had been doubted, however, whether the first element could receive consideration at all,[1] and as regarded the second element it could not be here said the testator had not disposed of a substantial portion of his estate, for if the annuities were payable out of capital and the estate failed to realise well, the annuities might carry away the whole estate from the child. The fact that there were provisions in the child's favour in the marriage-contract did not exclude the application of the rule, for such provisions existed in Dobie's Trustee v. Pritchard and Munro's Executors v. Munro. The will then being revoked, the whole means and estate of the deceased fell to the son as sole heir of his father.

The fifth parties maintained alternatively in the event of its being held that the conditio did not apply and that the will stood, that the annuities were only payable out of the income of the estate, and that the profits of the copartnership were part of the general executry of the deceased, and fell to be apportioned between the widow and the child according to the ordinary rules of intestate succession, the widow's share, however, falling to be attributed towards payment of her annuity.

Argued for the third party;—The conditio was a mere presumption founded on the pietas paterna, and yielded to facts and circumstances from which the testator's intention to retain his will unaltered could be inferred. There were such facts and circumstances here. It was admitted that the testator knew his wife was pregnant when he executed his will, and the will was only a partial settlement of his estate.[2] The judgments in the cases of Colquhoun, Monro's Executors, and Dobie's Trustee proceeded on the footing that the will made by the testator was a general disposition of his whole estate executed at a time when he had not before his mind the possibility of his ever having children.

Upon question 4, the third party argued that the annuity payable to her was upon the terms of the will preferable to that to the testator's mother, and in the event of the income proving insufficient it fell to be paid out of the capital.[3]

Question 5. There was no mention in the contract of copartnership of any principle of division, and the profits fell to be divided equally between her and her child.

Question 6. She was entitled to receive her share in addition to the annuities payable to her under the marriage-contract and the will.

The fourth party adopted the argument submitted by the third party as to the operation of the conditio, and further maintained that her annuity and that of the widow fell to be paid out of capital if the income proved insufficient to meet both annuities. On the sixth question, she maintained that the copartnery profits fell into the general executry of the deceased for the benefit of the widow and child, and that the widow's share must be imputed towards payment of her annuity.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The third question is, whether, in respect that the testator's wife bore a child after the execution of the will of 21st May 1889, that settlement is thereby revoked? The peculiar circumstance in the case is [1] Dobie's Trustee v. Pritchard, per Lord Rutherfurd Clark, 15 R. p. 4.

[2] Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, vol. ii. p. 981; Yule v. Yule, vide supra, p. 1135, note 2.

[3] Thomson v. Thomson's Trustees, July 10, 1868, 5 S. L. R. 742.

No. 212.
July 14, 1891.
Adamson's Trustees v. Adamson's Executors.

that Mrs Adamson, who had previously given birth to still-born twin children, was at the date of the testator's death six months advanced in pregnancy, the child in question being born three months after his father's death.

It is first necessary to consider what is the nature of the settlement of 1889. Was it a settlement which disposed of the testator's whole estate, and which in its essence and effect ought to be affected by the subsequent birth of a child to the testator?

The deed contains two provisions, both essentially of the nature of legacies. The testator provides a further annuity to his wife in addition to the annuity already provided to her by the marriage-contract, and also expresses the desire that his mother should have the free liferent use of a cottage belonging to him, and if his estate would permit of it, a free yearly annuity of £100. The testator does not dispose or intend to dispose of the universitas of his estate, but makes certain provisions of the nature of legacies, namely, an additional annuity to his wife, and a reasonable provision for the support of his mother. It is admitted in the case that at the time he executed this will the testator was aware that there was an immediate likelihood of his having a child, and I imagine that he did not think that he was by the execution of this will depriving his child of its interest in his estate. The mother was the child's natural guardian in the event of his death, and as she had a good income provided to her under the marriage-contract and the will, in addition to the sum to be received by her from her husband's partner, which I shall have afterwards to mention, he might fairly conclude that the child's interests would be well taken care of.

I am therefore of opinion that the will was not revoked by the subequent birth of the child, and that we must answer this question in the negative.

With regard to the next question, I may explain that the annuity to the testator's mother is provided only if the estate permit of it—that is to say, after carrying out the provisions otherwise directed—and that the trustees would not be justified in trenching on the annuity to the testator's widow in order to pay the annuity to his mother.

With regard to the fifth question, it was provided by the contract of copartnery between the testator and his partner in business, that if either of the partners should die during the continuance of the partnership, leaving a widow or children surviving him, the surviving partner should, for a period of six months from the date of the deceasing partner's death, "pay to the executors or administrators of said deceased partner, for the benefit of the widow, child, or children, the share of profits to which the said deceased partner would have been entitled had he lived." The amount of the fund payable under this article is, we are told, about £800, and the question is how it is to be dealt with. Is it to fall into executry, or to be disposed of in a particular manner? It appears to me, that looking to the terms of the clause in the contract of copartnery, it comes into the hands of the deceased partner's executors for the benefit of his widow and child, and falls to be divided into two equal portions, and that one of these portions must be paid to the widow and the other to the child.

The last question is, whether the widow's share of the sum to be paid under the clause of the contract of copartnery is to be impounded by the executors in order to be added to the fund out of which the annuity provided to her by the will is payable, or whether she is entitled to her share of this sum in addition to that annuity? I am of opinion that the latter is the true answer, and that the widow is entitled to have her share of this sum paid over to her, and that it does not fall to be impounded by the executors to form part of the fund out of which her annuity is payable.

No. 212.
July 14, 1891.
Adamson's Trustees v. Adamson's Executors.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree in regard to the answer to be given to the third question. I think the will is not revoked either as to the increased annuity thereby given to the testator's wife or as to the provisions to the mother.

With respect to the fourth question, my view is that the widow is entitled to the annuity of £200, increased to £400, absolutely, and that the whole estate, income and capital, must go to meet that in the first instance.

In regard to the annuity provided to the testator's mother, I see nothing to limit that provision and make it payable only out of the income of the estate. The words "if my estate permit" mean that the annuity to the widow is to be paid first, and that till it is paid the estate can afford nothing; but if after meeting the widow's annuity and the testator's debts, there is enough left to provide an annuity of £100 to the testator's mother, she is entitled to have it, and we are informed that there will be no difficulty about it, the estate being sufficient to meet both annuities.

On the other questions I agree with your Lordship.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the third question in the negative: Find in answer to the fourth question that the third party's annuity is not liable to be diminished should there not be sufficient funds to meet both the annuities to the third and fourth parties; also that the payment of the annuities is not limited to the income of the estate, but may, to the extent to which that may be necessary, be paid out of capital: Answer the first alternative of the fifth question in the negative, and the second alternative in the affirmative, and find that the property in question falls to be divided equally between the third and fifth parties: Answer the sixth question in the negative."

JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—DUNCAN & BLACK, W.S.—CAIRNS, M'INTOSH, & MORTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 213.
July 14, 1891.
Home's Trustees.

THOMAS RIDDELL AND ANOTHER (Home's Trustees), First Parties. ISABELLA CATHERINE RUSSELL OR HOME (William Home's Executrix), Second Party.—C. S. Dickson—C. K. Mackenzie. JOHN WADDELL AND OTHERS (Patrick Home's Next of Kin), Third Parties.—Lorimer.

Succession—Vesting—Trust—Direction to convey to beneficiary on occurrence of a certain event.—A testator directed his trustees to pay certain legacies and annuities, and to pay the interest of the residue, "after deducting the foregoing bequests and annuities," to his widow during her life, "and at the death of the said" widow and the other annuitants, "I request my trustees to divide the said residue into nine equal shares, and to pay one ninth share to" a nephew, and the remaining shares to other persons. The nephew predeceased the widow. Held that the share of residue had vested in the nephew at the testator's death.

2D DIVISION. M.

PATRICK HOME died on 16th August 1879 survived by his wife. He had no children. He left a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole means and estate to Thomas Riddell and James Honeyman Smith, as trustees. The purposes of the trust were, inter alia,

No. 213.
July 14, 1891.
Home's Trustees.

for payment to Mrs Home of certain marriage-contract provisions, and an additional annuity of £340, and of a liferent of the testator's house and furniture. After directing payment of certain legacies and annuities, the testator provided, in the ninth purpose, "I ordain my said trustees to pay the interest of the residue of my means and estate, after deducting the foregoing bequests and annuities, to the said Catherine Home, my wife, during all the days of her life; and at the death of the said Catherine Home and the other annuitants above named, I request my said trustees to divide the said residue into nine equal shares, and to pay one ninth share to the said William Home," a nephew of the testator.

The remaining equal shares were to be conveyed to certain other legatees.

William Home died on 3d February 1885 leaving a will. The truster's widow, the liferenter, survived till 29th January 1891. All the annuitants had predeceased the testator.

After her death a question arose between William Home's executor, on the one hand, and the next of kin of Patrick Home, the testator, on the other hand, as to whether the one-ninth share of the residue of Patrick Home's estate, directed to be conveyed to William Home, had vested in him, or had lapsed in consequence of his predeceasing the liferenter.

A special case was stated putting this question,—"Did the one-ninth share of residue bequeathed to William Home vest in him a morte testatoris, or did it lapse by reason of the said William Home having predeceased the liferenter?"

Argued for William Home's executor;—The share vested in William Home. The presumption was for vesting, and there was nothing to restrain its effect. It was true that the division of residue into shares and the payment of them were to be made "at the death of the said Catherine Home and the other annuitants," but that was simply to ensure that the annuities should not be defeated. The doctrine of Bryson's Trustee v. Clark[1] could not, as explained in Hay's Trustees, apply, for it applied where there were two elements—(1) nothing expressed in favour of the beneficiary except a direction to convey on the occurrence of a future event, and (2) failing him, to other persons as substitutes.[2] The latter element was here absent.

Argued for Patrick Home's next of kin;—The provision lapsed by William Home predeceasing the event on which only he was entitled to a conveyance. Not the time of conveyance, but the right itself was conditional upon that event. As was said in Bryson's Trustees, which was recently followed in Forbes' Trustees v. M'Condach's Trustees,[3] "nothing was expressed in favour of the beneficiary," William Home, "except a direction to convey to him on the occurrence of" Mrs Patrick Home's decease. He predeceased that event, and therefore nothing vested in him.

THE COURT, holding that the case of Bryson's Trustees v. Clark did not apply, found that the ninth share of residue bequeathed to William Home vested in him a morte testatoris.

GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] Nov. 26, 1880, 8 R. 142.
[2] Hay's Trustees v. Hay, June 19, 1890, 17 R. 961.
[3] Dec. 12, 1890, 18 R. 230.

No. 214. EDINBURGH NORTHERN TRAMWAYS COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Murray—Salvesen.

G. V. MANN AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Johnston—Ure.

July 14, 1891.* Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

Company—Preliminary expenses—Promotion-money—Liability to account—Personal bar.—A public company, formed for the purpose of introducing a new system of tramways in Edinburgh, entered into an agreement with contractors for the execution of the works at a certain price, one provision being that the expenses of procuring the Act should be met by the contractors. M. and B., the company's solicitor and engineer, who had also been its chief promoters, on the next day executed a second agreement with the contractors on their own behalf, by which they undertook to relieve the contractors of their obligation for expenses in consideration of a sum of £17,000.

The company having brought an action some years afterwards calling M. and B. to account for any moneys received by them under that agreement, the defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the transaction had been known to the company, or to all who were members of it at the time, and that the company was therefore barred from now challenging it.

Held that the defenders' fiduciary relation to the company precluded them from deriving any private advantage from the agreement, and that they were bound to account to the company for sums received by them under it.

Appeal—Leave to appeal.—Circumstances in which the Court (dub. Lord M'Laren) refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords, on the ground that there was a probability of a second appeal should leave be granted.

1st DIVISION. Lord Trayner, C.

THE EDINBURGH NORTHERN TRAMWAYS ACT, the object of which was the introduction of a cable system of tramways in Edinburgh, received the royal assent in August 1884. Its principal promoters were Mr William Hamilton Beattie, architect and surveyor, Edinburgh, and afterwards engineer of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company, and Mr George V. Mann, S.S.C., solicitor for the bill, and afterwards of the Company. A bill for the same purpose had been introduced in the previous session of Parliament, but had then failed to pass. The capital of the company was £90,000, divided into 9000 shares of £10 each. It was specially stipulated by the Corporations of Edinburgh and Leith, and the stipulation was incorporated in the Act, that the contract for the making of the lines should be advertised for public competition.

Prior to the passing of the Act, the Patent Cable Tramways Corporation, Limited, which had been recently incorporated, had made overtures to the promoters with the view of obtaining the contract for the construction of the line, with the result that a tender was afterwards made and accepted by the company, and embodied in an agreement, dated 24th October 1884, between the company and the Cable Corporation. Another agreement was executed on 25th October 1884, between the Cable Corporation and Mann and Beattie.

By the agreement of 24th October it was provided, inter alia (1) that the Cable Corporation should, at their own cost, purchase and convey to the company certain heritable subjects in Edinburgh; (2) that they should construct the tramway lines authorised by the company's Act; (3) that they should pay or provide for the whole costs, charges, and liabilities incurred by the company in obtaining their Act. It was further provided that the consideration to be paid therefor should be a sum of £93,000, payable to the extent of £5000 by the issue to the Cable Corporation, or their nominees, on signing the contract, of 500 fully paid £10 shares of the pursuers' company, and as to the balance, in monthly instalments, on the certificates of the engineers, under the condition that, failing payment in cash, the Cable

* Decided June 26, 1891.

No. 214.

July 14, 1891. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

Corporation should be bound to accept Lloyd's bonds, or fully paid shares, or mortgage debentures of the company.

By the agreement of 25th October, which proceeded upon the narrative of the previous agreement of 24th October, and of the undertaking by the Cable Corporation to pay the costs and liabilities incurred in obtaining the Company's Act, and "with a view to fixing the amount they may be called upon to pay under the said contract," it was agreed (1) that Mann and Beattie should relieve the corporation of the liability it had undertaken for the expenses of the Act, and (2) that the corporation should pay to Messrs Mann and Beattie the sum of £17,000 (£5000 in cash, on the execution of the agreement, £8500 by the issue of debentures of the Cable Corporation, payable on the opening of any part of the company's line, and £3500, by the transfer to Messrs Mann and Beattie of 350 fully paid-up shares of the company). The £5000 was paid on 20th September 1884, a month prior to the date of either agreement, and prior to an advertisement for tenders for the works. The £8500 of debentures were not issued until 1886, and the £3500 in shares were transferred by the Cable Corporation, or their nominees, by transfers dated 28th May 1886.

In February 1889 the Tramways Company brought an action against Mann and Beattie, concluding, inter alia, for an accounting by them in regard to all moneys, shares, or debentures received by either of them as promoters of the Tramways Company, or in virtue of the agreement of 25th October 1884. The persons who acted as the first directors of the company, and assisted to promote it, five in number, were also called as defenders.

The pursuers alleged, inter alia;—(Cond. 7) "The said sum of £17,000 greatly exceeded the actual cost of the Act of Incorporation of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company, and the legitimate expenses of the promotion of the company; and the form of agreement whereby Messrs Mann and Beattie undertook to relieve the Cable Corporation of their obligation to pay the costs of obtaining the Act was a mere device to conceal the fact that they were getting a large bonus for their services as promoters at the expense of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company. The said sum had been fixed by agreement between the Cable Corporation and Messrs Mann and Beattie, as promoters, as the sum for which they were willing to practically transfer the bill to the Cable Corporation. The sum in question (£17,000) was taken into account by the Cable Corporation in fixing the contract price at £93,000, and the Cable Corporation stipulated for the issue to them of 500 shares of the company to be delivered on the execution of the contract between them and the company, in exchange for the £5000 in cash which they had to pay to Messrs Mann and Beattie at the same time. The tender lodged by the Cable Corporation was for £93,000, and this sum was acquiesced in without any independent inquiry being made on behalf of the pursuers, the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company. The pursuers have thus suffered damage to the extent of £15,000 or thereby by the enhanced price which they were charged in order to admit of the bonus being given to the defenders Mann and Beattie. . . ."

They also stated that it was only upon the retirement of the first directors, on 28th February 1888, after a meeting had been called by requisition of the shareholders (the principal of whom at that date were Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company, the subcontractors for the works, as afterwards narrated), that the above stated facts became known and that they were in a position to call the defenders to account.

The defenders admitted that it had been originally arranged by the company to adopt the patent cable system of traction, and that no other

No. 214.
July 14, 1891.
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

tender than that of the Cable Corporation was received by the company, but they explained that they were free to accept any offer. They denied that the £17,000 exceeded the actual cost of the Act, and the legitimate expenses of the promotion of the company, and stated that the whole actings of the defenders in regard to obtaining the Act were well known to the pursuers, as well as to the Cable Corporation. They further explained that the pursuers "are barred from taking the objection here indicated, as the whole shares in the pursuers' company, other than those held by the defenders, are in the hands of the representatives of the Cable Corporation, and of their nominees, who, being a majority of the company, nominate and control the directors, and have instructed the raising of this action."

It was also stated in defence that the pursuers' company had never truly become a public company, that its formation had never been advertised, that its prospectus had never been published, nor any of its shares issued to the public.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders Mann and Beattie having, by means of their position as promoters of the company, received the said bonus of £17,000, they are bound to count and reckon therefor, and to communicate to the company any benefit gratuitously received by them at the company's expense.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) No moneys, shares, debentures, or other considerations having been received by or agreed to be paid or performed to Mr Mann and Mr Beattie as promoters of the said company, they ought to be assoilzied from the first conclusion of the summons. (3) The pursuers' company are barred by their actings and acquiescence, as condescended on, from pursuing the present action. (5) The second and remaining conclusions of the summons being based on the ground that the defenders Mann and Beattie occupied a fiduciary relation to the company when they entered into the agreement of 25th October 1884 and compromise of 31st May 1886 [referred to below], and the whole persons who have at any time been interested, either directly or indirectly, in the shares of the pursuers' company, having been parties to or being bound by said agreement, these defenders should be assoilzied from these conclusions.

Proof was led.

In support of their contention that the agreement of 25th October 1884 had been confirmed by the company, the defenders led evidence to shew that drafts of the agreements of 24th and 25th October 1884 had been submitted to a meeting of the directors of the company, held on 19th August 1884,* but this allegation was negatived by the Court.

The defenders also founded upon proceedings in the English Court, which were taken at their instance by request of the directors of the com-

* At this meeting four of the five original directors and Mann and Beattie were present. Two other gentlemen attended, but it did not appear in what capacity. The minute bore,—" . . . It was remitted to Mr Mann and Mr Beattie to make such inquiries in London or elsewhere as they may consider necessary, with a view to determine the best system of traction to be adopted for the undertaking, and to obtain such information as is necessary with reference to the raising of the capital. Mr Mann and Mr Beattie were instructed to confer on the subject with Mr Waddell and Mr Couper on behalf of the board, with power to solicit offers from persons likely to enter into suitable arrangements both as regards construction and capital, advertise for tenders, and take such other steps as they may think necessary, with power to employ such financial, legal, or other personal assistance in London as they may deem requisite. . . ."

No. 214.

July 14, 1891.
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

pany to enforce their rights under the agreement of 25th October 1884, and to restrain the Cable Corporation from dealing with the 500 shares which had been issued to them in terms of the agreement of 24th October 1884 in such a way as to prejudice the company's rights. These proceedings resulted in the completion of "Heads of Compromise," dated 31st May 1886, between the Cable Corporation, the company, and Mann and Beattie, and in an order by the English Court, in both of which the agreement of 25th October was dealt with. It appeared that the origin of this litigation was that there had been considerable delay on the part of the corporation in beginning the works under their contract, but that the company could not take legal proceedings, as the time for completing the works had not expired, and that they had accordingly applied to Mann and Beattie to insist in performance of the agreement of 25th October in order to bring matters to a point.

The compromise of 31st May 1886 was also embodied in an agreement, dated 22d July 1886, between the Tramways Company and the Cable Corporation, modifying to some extent the agreement of 24th October 1884. The Cable Corporation thereafter proceeded to construct part of the works, but, so far as carried out, they were really executed by their subcontractors, Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company, and it was not until 28th January 1888 that the sections under construction were opened for public traffic.

In payment of the works the Tramways Company issued shares and mortgages of the company to the Cable Corporation. Of 4500 shares issued out of the 9000 shares which constituted the capital of the company, all except 152 were issued to the Corporation. Of the 152, 150 were issued to the first directors of the Company, and 2 to the first auditors. The mortgages issued were in favour either of the Cable Corporation or of creditors of the company in payment of working expenses.

On 14th January 1888 the Cable Corporation was ordered to be wound up, and Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company, who were large creditors in respect of the work done by them, subsequently purchased their whole assets, including their interest in the shares and mortgages in and over the Tramways Company, which the corporation had come to hold in trust for the Assets Realisation Company, Limited (who had advanced them funds), under an assignment which was made subject to and under the burden of the agreement of 25th October 1884. Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company also gave an undertaking to pay the amount due by the Cable Corporation to the Assets Realisation Company on the condition that they were to have the contract for the construction of the remaining unexecuted portion of the works. These conditions were carried out in the form of two agreements between the liquidator of the Cable Corporation, the Realisation Company, and Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company, in one of which, dated 22d May 1888, it was provided that the purchasers should accept such title as the Cable Corporation and the Assets Company had to the property agreed to be sold, and in a schedule to it, headed "Documents relating to the Undertaking of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company," there were set forth a number of deeds, including those of the 24th and 25th October 1884.

It appeared from the proof that Mr Turnbull, one of the original directors, who had since died, had been absent from the country in October 1884, and had subsequently demanded explanations from Mr Mann in regard to the expenses attending the passing of the Act. These Mr Mann had declined to give, because he considered that the agreement of 25th October was "one with which the directors had nothing to do." Mr Turn-

No. 214.

July 14, 1891.
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

bull had subsequently resigned his directorate, and disposed of his holding in the company to Mann and Beattie.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 18th July 1890, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders George Villiers Mann and William Hamilton Beattie are bound to account to the pursuers for the whole sums of money, debentures, shares, or other considerations received by them under and in virtue of the agreement entered into between them and the Patent Cable Tramways Corporation, Limited, dated 25th October 1884: Appoints the said defenders to lodge in process by the first sederunt day of next session an account of all sums of money, debentures, shares, or other considerations received by them under said agreement, as also an account or accounts of all sums which they claim respectively to be entitled to set against the before-mentioned sums of money, debentures, shares, or other considerations, with the vouchers of such account or accounts: Quoad ultra continues the cause: Grants leave to reclaim." *

---

* "OPINION.— . . . These two documents,—the contract of 24th October 1884 and the agreement of the following day,—although bearing to be executed of different dates, were in reality parts of one transaction arranged and agreed upon by the corporation and the said defenders, the purposes of which were, on the one hand, to secure to the corporation the contract for constructing the authorised tramway lines in Edinburgh, and, on the other, to secure to the said defenders payment of the sum of £17,000. This transaction presents several objectionable features. In the first place, it was in violation of the stipulations made by the Corporations of Edinburgh and Leith in giving their consent to the construction of the tramways (consents without which the Act obtained by the company would not have passed) to the effect that the contract for the construction of the lines should be offered for public competition. These stipulations—stated as plainly as language could state them in the agreements which were scheduled to the Act—were stipulations which the corporations who made them had an undoubted interest to enforce. The transaction between the Cable Corporation and the defenders Beattie and Mann was entered into with these stipulations fully in view, and the pretence they made—for it was only pretence—of advertising the contract as one open for competition, only shews that the violation of the foresaid stipulations was deliberate and intentional. (Secondly) The transaction was in violation of the duty which the defenders owed to the pursuers' company. The defender Mann was the solicitor of the company, and Beattie was its engineer; and they were charged with the interests of the company, whom (and at whose expense) they were in London representing. The interest of the company clearly was to have the construction contract given to the contractor who would undertake it at the lowest price. Instead of this, however, without competition, and indeed without any honest inquiry as to the amount for which any other contractor would undertake the construction of the line, the defenders agreed to give, and did give, the construction contract to the Cable Corporation at a price agreed upon between themselves, that price including a sum of £17,000 to be paid to the defenders. (Thirdly) If the defenders had claimed from the company, for whom they were acting, the amount due to them for work done and disbursements made in connection with obtaining the company's Act, it is plain that they would have required to have given a detailed and to some extent a vouched account of such work and disbursements. By including the £17,000, however, in the contract price of £93,000 the defenders were adopting a course by which the rendering of any such account would be made unnecessary, and all examination of such an account avoided. That this was the purpose and intention of the defenders in entering into this transaction becomes to my mind clear enough from the attitude which the defender Mann assumed towards Mr Turnbull, one of the company's directors, when he demanded from Mr Mann 'particulars of the amounts which had been paid towards expenses.' I think this purpose and intention is

The defenders reclaimed.

No. 214.

July 14, 1891.

Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

Argued for them;—An agreement for "promotion-money," in the further evidenced by the mode in which the transaction was carried out. It being one transaction, it could easily, and would naturally, have been embodied in one deed, if nothing more was intended to be done than to give expression to the agreement which had been concluded. It would have been as easy in the construction contract to have said that the Cable Corporation had undertaken out of the contract price to pay Mann and Beattie £17,000 in full payment of the expenses incurred in connection with the obtaining of the company's Act, as to say that they, the corporation, undertook to relieve the company of liability for such expenses. To have done so, however, would have brought the bargain between them and Mann and Beattie before the consideration of the company, and would probably have led to the inquiry, which the defenders, I think, desired to avoid. Accordingly the second deed, in the form of an agreement between the Cable Corporation and the defenders, was executed, as a deed embodying a bargain with which, as Mr Mann expresses it, 'the directors had nothing to do.' (Lastly) The sum of £17,000 to be paid to the defenders was not fixed upon a consideration of any account of what charges were due to them, or of what disbursements they had made,—it was a mere guess.

"It is not enough, however, to entitle the pursuers to the accounting which they seek that the transaction I have been dealing with presents features which are objectionable, or that the circumstances surrounding it throw some discredit upon its character. It may still be a transaction of which the defenders are entitled to take any benefit which it confers, and one which the pursuers cannot now effectually challenge. This is the position which the defenders now maintain; and I proceed to notice the grounds on which they maintain it.

"First. It is said that the £17,000 is not 'promotion-money' in the usual sense of that term, which the defenders are bound to refund. This may be so, but it does not seem to me to be material by what name the £17,000 may be called. The defenders may be bound to account for the £17,000 although it was not in the ordinary sense promotion-money.

"Second. The defenders plead that the pursuers are barred from insisting in the present action by reason of their actings and acquiescence. So far as I can gather from the proof, there have been no 'actings' on the part of the pursuers which would bar their present demand. As regards acquiescence, it is plain enough that the pursuers could not acquiesce in a matter of which they had no knowledge, and therefore it has to be considered, first, what knowledge they had of the agreement in question, and when they obtained it.

"There is evidence given by Mann and Beattie to the effect that the construction contract and the agreement were both submitted in draft to a meeting of the directors of the pursuers' company held on 19th August 1884, and this is corroborated by Major Boulton, one of the directors who was present. I am of opinion that this evidence does not prove the fact. (1) The evidence of Mr Mann and Mr Beattie is open to the observation that it is the evidence of interested parties, and I say no more about it than this, that it is insufficient to satisfy me if not supported. (2) While I say nothing against the truthfulness of Major Boulton, it is plain that his recollection is not good. He admits that in another action he gave evidence recently to an effect quite different from and contradictory of that which he now gives. (3) There are two other persons who were present as directors at the meeting referred to, available as witnesses for the defenders, who were not called. (4) The minutes of that meeting make no reference whatever to the construction contract or the agreement having been produced, read, or exhibited at the meeting. On the contrary, the minutes contained an authority to certain persons (including the defenders) 'to solicit offers from persons likely to enter into suitable arrangements, both as regards construction and capital, advertise for tenders,' &c., which could scarcely have been done if the deeds I have mentioned had been before the meeting, shewing that the 'construction' had already been arranged for, and that further advertisement

No. 214.

July 14, 1891. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

usual sense of the term, if incorporated in the prospectus of a company, would not be illegal. It was necessary to attend to the facts of the case, for although Mann and Beattie had come to be regarded as the sole promoters of the company, they had originally a number of others associated with them, and what they did was to interpose and take the whole risk themselves. They were the servants of the company, and they made the agreement in the knowledge of everyone, their object being to take upon themselves the whole burden of starting it. Accordingly, assum-

---

'for tenders' was consequently unnecessary. (5) Mr Turnbull was present at this meeting, and if the agreement had been read and explained then, he would not have made the demand which he subsequently made on Mr Mann for information regarding the amount paid as the expenses of obtaining the Act—information which Mr Mann refused to give. And (6) it is difficult to understand why Mr Mann should have refused the information sought by Mr Turnbull on the ground that it was a matter with which the directors had nothing to do if that information had already been given, even partially, to a meeting of directors as was stated. I am of opinion, for the reasons I have given, that it is not proved (not to put it higher) that the agreement between the Cable Corporation and the defenders was submitted or brought to the knowledge of the directors of the pursuers' company at their meeting of 19th August 1884. If not brought to their knowledge then, it is not proved that it was brought to their knowledge until long after it was concluded and partly implemented by the payment of £5000 in cash. Even when brought to the knowledge of the pursuers' directors it was never approved or adopted, and it is certain that the directors never had before them, and never asked, the necessary information to enable them to determine whether they should approve of the agreement or not. If the directors had approved of the transaction embodied in the agreement as one which authorised the defenders to charge the company, or take payment out of its funds of a sum of £17,000 in name of expenses for obtaining the Act, without the production of an account or a single voucher shewing how that expense had been incurred, I should have held any such approval or adoption of the agreement in such circumstances as ultra vires of the directors and in no way binding on the company. I do not take into account in this connection the question whether the then directors were independent of the defenders, or whether the defenders furnished the directors with their qualification. But there is enough proved to shew that the directors were at least to a large extent indebted to the defenders for their qualification; and the pursuers' suggestion that the defenders' generosity to the directors was not quite disinterested does not strike me as being improbable. . . .

"The fifth plea brings me to what I think is the real point in the case. It appears to me to be established that the defenders, while occupying a fiduciary relation to the pursuers' company, entered into an agreement to their own advantage and to the detriment of the company, to which effect should not be given. As I have already stated, the defenders, at the date of the agreement in question, were the one the solicitor and the other the engineer of the company. Not only so, but they were, when the agreement was made, in London, specially charged with watching over the interests of the company. They took advantage of their position to arrange that they should be paid out of the company's funds (the amount which the company were to pay for the construction of their lines) a sum for their expenses in promoting and carrying the company's Act through Parliament, which included, as is now admitted, expenses not incurred with reference to that Act. So far as the advantage thus obtained by the defenders was gratuitous, they were bound to communicate it to the pursuers. I think the defenders must now account for the £17,000 which they received under that agreement in cash or securities. Whatever they can shew was really due to them in connection with the passing of the company's Act of 1884 they will be entitled to retain. But I think they cannot charge against the pursuers' company any expense incurred in connection with the bill of 1883, which did not pass."

No. 214.

July 14, 1891. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

ing that the £17,000 was rightly termed "promotion-money," a state of circumstances existed in this case which brought about the same legal result as if the agreement had been embodied in the prospectus. The five first directors and the two defenders at that time really constituted the whole company, for there was no public issue of the shares, and the directors could not but have known of the agreement of 25th October. The minute of meeting of directors of 19th August 1884 shewed that they were cognisant of the transactions with the Cable Corporation. The Lord Ordinary criticised this minute adversely. But the answer to these criticisms was that in any view a sufficient prima facie case had been made out to lay upon the pursuers the onus of shewing that the agreement was not known, and they had failed to discharge it. The Lord Ordinary had also failed to advert to the fact that the litigation in the English Courts at the instance of the defenders Mann and Beattie made the existence of the agreement public to everyone concerned. This was a litigation which Mann and Beattie were asked by the directors to institute and undertake. It was impossible that they should have been invited to do so unless the directors had fully known of the existence of the agreement. It was at anyrate conclusive as regarded all the members of the company at that date. The position of Mr Turnbull, one of the directors, which was founded on by the Lord Ordinary, was explained by the fact that he had been absent in America in September and October 1884, and that he had not therefore been present when the agreements of October were entered into. He had afterwards been allowed to leave the directorate, and his shares were taken over by Mann and Beattie. It was very important that there had been no public allotment or issue of the shares of the company. The share capital, so far as issued, had all along been entirely held by nominees of or persons who represented the promoters and Messrs Mann and Beattie on the one hand, and by the Cable Corporation and their successors on the other. It was said that Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company were not in that position. But they were transferees with notice of the agreement in question, a notice which appeared on the face of the documents under which they became transferees, for the agreement of 25th October was specially mentioned. Although, therefore, the defenders would be bound to account for any profit they had made under the agreement, if they had made a secret of it,[1] no secret had been made here. The Cable Corporation and their nominees, Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company, who were the real pursuers of this action, held along with the defenders all the shares of the company, so far as issued, and constituted really the whole company. The pursuers were therefore barred from challenging their own agreement.[2]

Argued for the respondents;—The facts dealt with by the Lord Ordinary did not appear to be seriously challenged, but it was said that his Lordship had failed to deal with one of the defenders' pleas. It was said that the Tramways Company had no separate existence or independent position apart from the Cable Corporation and Mann and Beattie, the two parties to the agreement, and that that fact constituted a difference

---

[1] Henderson v. Huntington Copper Co., Jan. 12, 1877, 4 R. 294, affd. Nov. 29, 1877, 5 R. (H. L.) 1.

[2] In re Gold Company, 1878, L. R., 11 Chanc. Div. 701; Peak v. Gurney, July 1871, L. R., 13 Eq. 79, affd. H. L., 6 Eng. and Ir. Apps. 377; Ambrose Lake Mining Co., ex parte Taylor, 1880, L. R., 14 Chanc. Div. 390; British Seamless Paper Box Co., 1881, L. R., 17 Chanc. Div. 467; New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, 1876, L. R., 5 Chanc. Div. 73, Jessel, M. R., 113; Spackman v. Evans, 1868, L. R., 3 Eng. and Ir. App. 171, Lord Cranworth, p. 190.

No. 214.

July 14, 1891. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

between the present case and that of the Huntington Copper Company.[1] The only asset of value at the date of the agreement was the Act itself, which was surely the property of the Tramways Company, and the return for it—for the £17,000 really represented the price of the Act—could not go into the private coffers of the defenders. It might be that the £17,000 was legitimately earned, and that the pursuers' case was bad upon its merits; but all that was asked was an accounting. It was said that the directors of the company knew of the existence of the agreement. If they knew they could only have assented to it as participes fraudis. The real constituents upon whom the fraud was perpetrated were surely the future shareholders of the company. There was no authority for holding that a company could be barred from challenging such an agreement, unless it were proved that all present and possible future shareholders had consented to it. The company had power to issue shares to subsequent shareholders, for there was capital remaining unissued. The agreement could not be effectually ratified until the whole capital had been issued, and if the interest of future allottees was prejudiced they would have a right to set the agreement aside as having been entered into to their prejudice and to the advantage of those who occupied a fiduciary position towards the company.[2] The reclaimers' argument turned upon two questions of fact. In the first place, it was said that no shares had been issued to the public,—that it was not contemplated that there should be any issue to the public,—and accordingly that all who were concerned in the matter were fully cognisant of it; and in the second place, that no members of the public had become allottees. But, in the first place, at the time of the execution of the agreement, there was an intention of issuing the shares to the public, and the indifference of the Cable Corporation as to the amount to be paid to the defenders was explained by this fact. In the second place, an allottee of shares was in a different position from a transferee. When the whole members of the company allotted shares among themselves without any consideration, anyone who came in afterwards might challenge the proceedings in the name of the company. There might be future allottees here who would not take in any way subject to the infirmity which attached to the Cable Corporation and its transferees. All the cases quoted by the reclaimers supported the respondents' contention. In the Gold Company's case,[3] the whole unissued capital had been ultimately issued among existing shareholders, and there was notice to anyone joining the company that the directors might allot shares among the shareholders without any consideration. There was no fraud by the company there. In the Ambrose Lake Company's case,[4] it was a ground of judgment that there were no future allottees, and that there could be none. The British Seamless Paper Box Company's case[5] was very special, as the Court held that all parties had concurred in the arrangement which was challenged. There was no case in which it had been held that a future allottee was barred. Further, the knowledge of individual shareholders did not transmit to onerous transferees so as to bar the company from challenging the agreement in the interest of the latter. Even assuming that Dick, Kerr, & Company were bound to know of the agreement, knowledge of it was not enough without assent.

---

[1] 4 R. 294, affd. 5 R. (H. L.) 1.

[2] Buckley on Sec. 38 of the Companies Act (6th ed.) 570; Society for the Illustration of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, June 1840, 2 Beavan, 559.

[3] L. R., 11 Chanc. Div. 701.

[4] L. R., 14 Chanc. Div. 390.

[5] L. R., 17 Chanc. Div. 467.

At advising,— No. 214.

July 14, 1891. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders and some other persons having conceived the project of constructing tramways in Edinburgh upon the cable principle, which are now called the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company, presented a bill to Parliament in the year 1883 for the purpose of incorporating themselves, and of obtaining powers to construct the lines. They did not succeed in obtaining their bill in the year 1883, but in 1884 there was an Act passed incorporating the defenders and other persons, for the purpose of exercising the powers therein conferred and constructing these tramways. It does not appear very clearly who promoted—I mean in the way of personal engagement or employment—the bill of 1883, but undoubtedly in the year 1884 the management of the bill in its passage through Parliament was entirely in the hands of the two reclaimers, Mr Mann and Mr Beattie, and they stand therefore towards the incorporation which was created by that bill in the relation of fiduciary persons.

The object of the present action is to call Mr Mann and Mr Beattie to account for certain moneys to the amount of £17,000 which it is said came into their hands in the course of conducting that business in London, and one question which has been considered by the Lord Ordinary is, whether that £17,000 is of the nature of promotion-money. His Lordship hesitates to call it by that name, but I confess I do not see any difficulty as to the name from the nature of the moneys which were received by the reclaimers. They were vested by their co-promoters with the whole management of the bill, and they received from the contractors for the work the sum of £17,000, half in cash, and the other half in shares and debentures of the company which was to be brought into existence. Now, I have no other name for that than promotion-money, but whether it be called by that name or not, I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary that it is of the same illegal character as promotion-money, and must be dealt with in the same way.

Having obtained the bill, and so brought the Tramways Company into existence, they proceeded to deal with another corporation called the Cable Corporation, who were in the habit of contracting for the construction of such works, and their agreement with them was that they should receive as the contract price of the work to be done by them the sum of £93,000. The agreement is dated 24th October 1884, and there is another agreement dated upon the following day, 25th October 1884, by which it is arranged that the reclaimers, Messrs Mann and Beattie, are to receive £17,000, the sum I have already mentioned. These two agreements, although dated respectively the 24th and 25th October, are really one transaction, and the nature of it, I think, may be very easily described. It was an arrangement by which the sum nominally payable to the Cable Tramways Corporation was £93,000, but it was stipulated that there should be deducted and paid over to the reclaimers the sum of £17,000, which is the sum now in question.

The Lord Ordinary has appointed the defenders, Messrs Mann and Beattie, to render an account of this £17,000 by the interlocutor which is now under review. The ground upon which his Lordship proceeds, I think, is plain enough, that this is either promotion-money or something equally illegal, and therefore that there must be an accounting between the parties, and in that conclusion I entirely acquiesce. I think it is out of the question altogether to say that these parties are to receive £17,000 without accounting in any way for the manner in which the expenditure was made, and for the services for which the remainder of the sum of £17,000 was supposed to be paid.

No. 214.

July 14, 1891.
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

That is the short and simple view of the case which I have taken, and which agrees substantially with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and I therefore move your Lordships to adhere to his interlocutor.

LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the statement which the Lord Ordinary has given of the facts, and also the exposition of the law of the case, with which your Lordship concurs, was not very seriously traversed by the reclaimers' counsel, but they said that the grounds of judgment were displaced by a consideration to which they thought the Lord Ordinary had not adverted.

It appears to me to be clear, entirely concurring with your Lordship, that the reclaimers occupied a fiduciary position towards the company—that is to say, not towards the existing members only, but towards the company itself, and all its members, present or future. They were certainly in a fiduciary position in executing for the company the contract with the Cable Corporation which is now in question. One of them was the solicitor of the company, and the other was the engineer, and was also in the position of acting as managing partner of the whole adventure. Apart altogether from that, they had undertaken to make a contract for the company; and they were therefore acting as trustees in that matter, and so became subject to the inflexible rule by which trustees are not allowed to take any benefit or advantage, however reasonable, from a contract which they are making on behalf of those with whose affairs they are entrusted. It therefore seems to me, that, apart altogether from the question whether the money for which they are required to account may be properly called promotion-money or not, the reclaimers have made a bargain for their own advantage which cannot stand. It was their duty to make the best bargain they possibly could for the company; and it was quite inconsistent with that duty to make any collateral bargain or any stipulation by which a part of the price to be paid by the company to the corporation should come into their hands. I assume that they were acting in perfectly good faith in making that arrangement. I assume also that they were entitled to adequate remuneration and reimbursement for all the expenses that they had incurred, and it may very well be that the bargain which they made was quite a reasonable one in itself, but being made through the Cable Corporation, and as part of the transaction between the Cable Corporation and the company with whose affairs the defenders were entrusted, it must be held that any benefit which could come to them through that bargain was obtained for the company and not for themselves.

Now, the ground upon which it is said that the general rule of law is displaced in this case, as I understood the argument, was this—that the whole transaction between Messrs Beattie and Mann and the Cable Corporation had been ratified and confirmed by the company. There is no ratification of the agreement by the direct action of the company. I do not think anything can be pointed to which can be suggested as being a direct confirmation. But then it is said that there is an implied confirmation by reason of an agreement for the compromise of certain actions between Messrs Beattie and Mann on the one hand and the Cable Corporation on the other, and between the Cable Corporation and the pursuers' company. It appears to me that there was no interest involved in the actions which form

No. 214.
July 14, 1891.
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

the subject of that compromise except the interest of the parties whom I have mentioned. Questions between Messrs Beattie and Mann and the Cable Corporation, and questions between the Cable Corporation and the company, were raised in these actions and settled by the agreement for compromise, but the question whether the defenders could retain for themselves the full benefit of the £17,000, which they were to receive from the Cable Corporation, or whether they were bound to account for it to the Northern Tramways Company, was not raised or involved in the litigation, and could not be affected by its settlement.

It was maintained on a somewhat different plea, that if the agreement in question was not confirmed by the company, it was confirmed by the members of the company then existing, or at all events, that all the existing members acted in such a way as to bar them from challenging it; and it was urged further that there is nobody now in the company who does not represent some one of those persons that were so barred, and therefore that there is no interest to be protected by the present administrators of the company of persons who are not precluded from challenging the agreement. It was maintained that this company was really in the position of a private copartnery, that there had been no publication of any prospectus, no shares issued to the public, and that everybody really interested in the matter was in the full knowledge of the transaction now in dispute and agreed to it.

I do not think that that was the position of the company. It is a corporation created by Act of Parliament for the purpose of carrying out a public undertaking. It does not consist of its present corporators, or the corporators who formed part of it at any one time, and it appears to me that the directors at the time that the transactions in question were carried through, and now, are trustees, not for the existing members alone, but for all the future members of the corporation also. If that be so, I confess I am unable to see how the conduct of individual shareholders, as distinguished from the action of the company itself, can bar the company as it now exists from challenging a transaction of this kind, and from calling the defenders to account for money which is alleged to be theirs. But I think that even amongst the present shareholders there are persons who would not be affected by the supposed plea in bar, which is said to affect the directors and members of the company at the time of the compromise, or at any other period prior to the raising of this action.

I do not think it necessary to examine the whole list of shareholders, because it appears to me that Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company, whose case was specially pressed upon us as shewing that the existing members of the company could not be allowed to challenge this transaction, would have been in no way barred from challenging it if they had been the only members of the company now in existence. In the first place, I think they hold shares which they did not receive though the Cable Corporation, and the ground upon which the plea in bar is taken against them, as I understand it, is that they are in exactly the same position as the Cable Corporation, and that the Cable Corporation, who had themselves made the agreement in dispute, could not be allowed now to find fault with it. But then, apart altogether from that first consideration, and admitting that the Cable Corporation could not, as shareholders, after they had acquired shares in the company, challenge the agreement which they had previously made with Messrs Beattie and Mann before they acquired such shares, I see no ground for holding that the same disqualification would attach to numerous transferees. The transfer of shares makes the transferees liable to all the conditions by which they may be affected in consequence of transactions that have been validly carried out by the company, but there is no principle, so far as I know, and no authority for holding, that the transferee of shares takes them also subject to personal pleas in bar that may be stated against the transferor. The case of Peak v. Gurney, which was referred to as an authority for that principle, and which was decided in the House of Lords, affords no countenance to it whatever. It appears to me therefore that transferees for onerous causes obtain a statutory title, and take their title subject to those conditions only which affect the shares themselves, into whose hands soever they may fall, and not subject to any mere personal pleas in bar, by which the transferors from whom they acquired might have been affected. Nor do I see that there is anything in the special terms of the agreement between Dick, Kerr, & Company, the Assets Company, and the Cable Corporation, which could deprive Dick, Kerr, & Company, as shareholders of the Northern Tramways Company, of any right which would be competent to other transferees for value. It is said that the agreement contains a stipulation for the acceptance of such a title as the vendors might be able to give, and that it also contains a reference to a number of previous agreements, one of which is the agreement now in dispute. Now, it does not appear to me that there is anything expressed or implied in that stipulation which can at all affect the right of Dick, Kerr, & Company, having become shareholders of the Northern Tramways Company, to take any objection which might be competent to other shareholders to such a transaction as that now in dispute. They obtained a perfectly good and unqualified title to the shares, and the reference to the agreement now in dispute and the other agreements would appear to me to have no other effect than this, that it might bar them from maintaining as against the party from whom they acquired, that they were relieved of their obligation to accept the title by the discovery of these agreements. They cannot plead ignorance of the agreement as an objection to the title. But I do not think their knowledge of the agreement can affect their position as shareholders of the Northern Tramways Company after they have acquired their shares, or prevent their participating in funds which the company may be entitled to recover from the defenders. I see nothing, therefore, in the position of these shareholders, or in the conditions under which they acquired, which can bar the company from calling upon the defenders to account for any moneys truly belonging to the company which may be found to be in their hands.

No. 214.
July 14, 1891.
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

These were the arguments upon which it was maintained that the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment were displaced, and I am of opinion that they are not well founded, and I therefore agree with your Lordship that the interlocutor should be affirmed.

THE COURT adhered.

On 15th July the defenders petitioned for leave to appeal.*
The pursuers opposed the application.

LORD PRESIDENT.—An application of this kind is always an appeal to the discretion of the Court, and in dealing with such applications the Court are influenced by a variety of considerations according to the circumstances of each particular case; but there is one consideration which is always present to the * Defenders' Authority.—Gardner v. Beresford's Trustees, July 17, 1877, 4 R. 1091. Pursuers' Authority.—Stewart v. Kennedy, Feb. 26, 1888, 16 R. 521.

No. 214.
July 14, 1891.
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

mind of the Court in disposing of such a question, and that is that there must not be, if possible, two appeals in the same case. Now, from what we have heard here it is, I think, obvious that if we should grant leave to appeal now there would be the risk of there ultimately being two appeals instead of one, for there cannot be any doubt that in the accounting which has been ordered questions of importance may arise which may be made the subject of a second appeal, if an appeal at the present stage is allowed. On the other hand, what will be the position of the parties if the case is allowed to remain here? The parties will have an opportunity of going on with the accounting, and of obtaining our judgment on any questions that arise with reference to it, and so exhausting the cause, before it is taken to appeal. I think it will be for the advantage of both parties that it should be so exhausted, and I am therefore for refusing leave to appeal.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The question of granting leave to appeal is a question of discretion in each case, but in exercising that discretion one of the main things to be kept in view is whether or not it is probable that there will be a second appeal, if leave should be granted. It appears to me to be very undesirable that there should be two appeals. I think that every cause should be exhausted in this Court before it goes to the House of Lords, except in very special circumstances. Here the interlocutor which we pronounced is to be followed by an accounting, and it is said that it is desirable to have the questions of law finally determined before going into that accounting. Now, it does not appear to me, as far as I understand the facts, that this accounting will involve any very grave or prolonged inquiry. It therefore does not seem to me to be any ground for allowing leave to appeal. On the other hand, it is said that it may involve questions of principle which may be considered important enough to take to the House of Lords, so that if we should grant the leave which is here prayed for, there would, in that event, be a second appeal. I therefore agree in thinking that leave to appeal should be refused.

LORD M'LAREN.—If this matter were now arising for the first time, I should be inclined to think that the only question for consideration would be this, whether the judgment which it is sought to appeal involves a question of such a character as to be a proper subject of appeal at the particular stage at which the case stands—the object of requiring leave being to prevent frivolous appeals. But I see from the cases which were cited that one ground for refusing leave to appeal is found in the probability of there being a second appeal. Now, I must say for myself that I am totally unable to form an opinion as to the probability of there being a second appeal, for that depends on the reasonableness of the parties quite as much as on the importance of the case. If I may form any opinion from my knowledge of the present case, I should say that no question remains which might suitably form the subject of a second appeal. I should incline therefore to grant leave to appeal at this stage. At the same time, I do not wish to express dissent, but rather to suggest whether it may not be possible to lay down a better canon for the determination of these questions than the probability of a second appeal.

LORD KINNEAR concurred with the Lord President and Lord Adam.

THE COURT refused the petition.

GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—A. & G. V. MANN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 215.
July 15, 1891.*
Lawrie v. Jackson.

ANDREW LAWRIE, Petitioner (Respondent).—D.-F. Balfour—Kennedy.
MRS M. C. FIRTH or INGLIS AND OTHERS, Respondents.
WILLIAM JACKSON, Compearer (Appellant).—Shaw.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Dean of Guild.—An interlocutor by a Dean of Guild refusing to sist as respondent a person who alleges a material interest to appear in a petition for authority to take down and rebuild a house is a final interlocutor quoad that person, and therefore appealable.

Dean of Guild—Petition for authority to erect new buildings—Right of neighbouring proprietor to be sisted as a party to the process.—Circumstances in which the Court (diss. Lord M'Laren) recalled an interlocutor of a Dean of Guild refusing to sist as a respondent to a petition for authority to erect new buildings a proprietor whose property did not immediately adjoin that on which it was proposed to erect the new buildings.

1ST DIVISION. Dean of Guild, Edinburgh. C.

ON 10th April 1891 Andrew Lawrie, surveyor, Edinburgh, presented a petition in the Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh, for authority to take down a villa belonging to him in Viewforth, and on the site thereof, and the garden ground attached thereto, to erect three tenements, comprising in all ten shops and twenty-nine dwelling-houses. The petitioner called as respondents the three immediately adjoining proprietors, viz., James Barclay, Mrs Reid, and Mrs Inglis, Mrs Inglis being the proprietor of the nearer half of a semi-detached villa adjoining the petitioner's property on the south. The half of that villa which was farther from the petitioner's property belonged to William Jackson, who was not called as a respondent. None of Jackson's property touched the petitioner's, the nearest point being ten feet distant.

Mrs Reid and Mrs Inglis lodged answers (along with another neighbouring proprietor named Currie, who had been sisted as a respondent), and pleaded that the proposed alterations would be a violation of conditions in the feu-contracts which they had a right to enforce.

Thereafter, but before the record had been closed, Mr Jackson lodged a minute, in which he craved to be allowed to be sisted as a party to the process, "he having not been called as a party, although he is the proprietor of the one-half of the double villa immediately adjoining on the south the ground on which the petitioner proposes to erect said tenements."

On 28th May the Dean of Guild refused the prayer of this minute, and on the same day closed the record.

Jackson appealed to the Court of Session.

On 26th June, in Single Bills, the petitioner objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that the interlocutor appealed against was neither an appealable interlocutory judgment nor a final interlocutor.[1]

Argued for Jackson;—The interlocutor was final quoad him, for if it stood he would be for ever shut out of the process.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am quite unable to see any objection to this appeal. The appellant alleges that he has an interest to be sisted. Are we to decide that he has no interest without hearing him, as the Dean of Guild appears to have done? I apprehend not. I have heard no objection to the competency of the appeal that I can give effect to. I am for repelling the objection.

---

* Decided July 11, 1891.

[1] 50 Geo. III. cap. 112, sec. 36; A. S., Nov. 12, 1825, part iii., cap. 1, sec. 1: Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 65.

No. 215.
July 15, 1891.
Lawrie v. Jackson.

LORD ADAM.—The Dean of Guild's jurisdiction is a somewhat peculiar jurisdiction. This is a process of lining, and the Dean of Guild may have thought himself entitled to decide that this gentleman had no real interest to intervene in this process. That this is a final interlocutor I have no doubt. The appellant can never be heard again in the Dean of Guild Court so long as that interlocutor stands. I think therefore that being final quoad the appellant, it is appealable. I only wish to add that if this had been an ordinary Sheriff Court process, I should not necessarily have decided the competency of a similar appeal in the same way. I desire to reserve my opinion on that point.

LORD M'LAREN.—The competency of this appeal depends upon whether it is an interlocutory judgment, for the 36th section of the Act Geo. III., cap. 112, discharges the right of appeal only in the case of interlocutory judgments. It appears to me that this is not an interlocutory judgment, because it determines finally that this party is not entitled to be sisted as a party to this process.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT repelled the objections to the competency of the appeal, and sent the case to the Summar Roll.

On 11th July the case was heard.

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant had a clear interest and title to object. His title was the same as that of Mrs Inglis, but it was no answer to his claim to be heard that she was in the process. The Dean of Guild might no doubt have a discretion to refuse to sist parties who had no colour of a title or interest, but it could not be said that that was the appellant's position. The minute did not profess to be an exhaustive statement of his case. He could only make such a statement if he was allowed to appear. In any case, even if his title and interest were less obvious than they were, his appearance would have caused no delay, for the record had not been closed when his minute was lodged. The whole delay was due to the petitioner's objections.

Argued for the petitioner;—A party not called in a process like the present had no absolute right to compear, but if he shewed a prima facie case, it was in the discretion of the Court to allow him to compear: if he were not allowed, he had his other legal remedies. Here the Dean of Guild had exercised a wise discretion in refusing to admit the appellant, for he was represented by parties in the process whose interest was exactly the same as his own, assuming that in law he had any interest at all. But his minute stated no case; it merely said that he was an adjoining proprietor who had not been called. In a summary process there must be some limit to the number of parties entitled to appear, and the natural limit was to admit, as matter of right, only those immediately adjoining the buildings which were to be altered, and beyond that limit only to admit parties if they made out a special case for indulgence. Here the appellant had made out no such case; at anyrate the Dean of Guild thought he had not, and the Court would not lightly interfere with the discretion of the Dean of Guild.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The prayer of this petition in the Dean of Guild Court asks for warrant to the petitioner to take down his present villa and on the site of it, and on the garden attached to it, to erect three tenements containing in all ten shops and twenty-nine separate dwelling-houses, and the space of ground upon which it is proposed that all this should be done is certainly not very extensive. The only parties who were called to answer the petition were a Mr James Barclay, a Mrs Mary Inglis, and a Mrs Reid, and the two last named lodged defences along with a Mr Currie. But before the record was closed Mr Jackson, the present appellant, put in a minute, in which he craved leave to be sisted "as a party to the process, he not having been called as a party, although he is the proprietor of the one-half of the double villa immediately adjoining on the south the ground on which the petitioner proposes to erect said tenements." Now, as I have said, this minute was lodged before the record was closed, and I really cannot see why the Dean of Guild refused to allow this gentleman to sist himself, and, if necessary, put in defences. It ought to be the object of the Dean of Guild to hear all parties who have any interest in the proposed building. But he has taken his own course, and has thought fit to put the case into such a shape that he should hear only the petitioner and some of the parties interested, whom the petitioner has chosen to call, but who are, I think, plainly not the only parties interested. I cannot say that I think the Dean of Guild has acted wisely in this respect. On the contrary, I think that he has been in too great a hurry to get this proceeding finished. It was said that the minute does not disclose grounds sufficient to entitle Mr Jackson to be heard in the Dean of Guild Court. I think that the minute is quite sufficient. I do not mean, of course, that it contains a detailed statement of the grounds upon which he desired to appear and be heard. It would have been quite irregular in a minute of that sort to give any such detailed statement. But I think the minute discloses enough to shew that he has a perfectly distinct and substantial interest in the determination of this question. It was also said that the result of refusing to allow this gentleman to sist himself was not to deprive him of all redress, seeing that he had the remedy of interdict or declarator open to him. I do not think that it is all desirable that we should encourage litigation of that kind in this case. On the contrary, it appears to me that this case is perfectly suited to the determination of the Dean of Guild Court, which is the Court appointed to decide as to buildings proposed to be erected within the municipality, and I do not see why the parties should be left to a remedy which, besides being very expensive, may be quite unnecessary. As I have said, I think that the Dean of Guild has gone too fast, and I am for remitting to him to allow the appellant to be sisted.

No. 215.

July 15, 1891.
Lawrie v. Jackson.

Lord Adam.—I concur with your Lordship, but at the same time I sympathise with a great deal of what Mr Kennedy said. It is, I suppose, a matter of discretion for the Dean of Guild whether any proprietors ought to be called other than those immediately adjoining the proposed building; but at the same time we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that proprietors may have a considerable interest in the proposed proceedings, although their houses may not be in immediate contact with that which it is desired to alter. It is said that the appellant Jackson's land comes within ten feet of the ground on which it is proposed to erect these tenements in place of a single villa with a garden round it. In these circumstances it appears to me very difficult to say that the appellant has not a title and a substantial interest to appear. I quite understand that the Dean of Guild should set his face against feuars dropping in one after another and insisting on being sisted merely by saying that they had an interest. I quite concede that the Dean of Guild has a discretion to exclude parties whose sole object is to obstruct the proceedings. The question is, whether there is such a state of affairs here as to justify the Dean of Guild in refusing to allow this appellant to appear and say what he has to say. Now, as far as I can gather, the Dean of Guild does not appear to have gone on the ground that the appellant had no interest or title to appear, but that his title and interest were identical with those of someone who had appeared. That seems to me a somewhat novel ground for refusing to allow a party to be sisted, and therefore I agree with your Lordship.

No. 215.
July 15, 1891.
Lawrie v. Jackson.

LORD M'LAREN.—I regret that I am unable to agree with your Lordships. It appears to me that the petitioner has complied with all the requirements of the Burgh Court Act of Sederunt by calling the immediately conterminous proprietors, and that no other persons are entitled to appear as of right. Where others than the immediately conterminous proprietor apply to be sisted as defenders they may, as a matter of convenience, be allowed to appear. I do not doubt that it is in the discretion of the Dean of Guild to admit other parties, but it seems to me that one condition of the exercise of that discretion must be that the person seeking admission should be able to shew that he has some interest of a nature fitted for trial in the Dean of Guild Court. The exclusion of a person from the Dean of Guild Court does not in any way prejudice him, for he has other remedies open to him. If he thinks he has a right of servitude with which the contemplated operations will interfere, his proper remedy is by way of interdict.

Now, Mr Shaw has explained that the appellant's only title is one which is identical mutatis mutandis with that of an immediately conterminous proprietor. It appears to me to be plain on the face of that title that it does not entitle the appellant to appear in the Dean of Guild Court as of right, because the defence proposed to be stated involves a question of heritable right cognate to one which was lately the subject of adjudication by the House of Lords. If the party has no legal right to appear in that Court, it appears to me, speaking generally, that he ought to be left to his remedy in this Court. I cannot see any advantage in having such questions tried in the Dean of Guild Court. These questions of building restrictions involve very delicate and perplexing questions of law, upon which the highest legal authorities have sometimes arrived at opposite conclusions. In my opinion the Court of the Dean of Guild is a tribunal which, by its constitution and mode of procedure, is utterly unfitted for the trial of such questions. I think that opinion is shared pretty generally in the profession. Its president is not a lawyer but a builder. He is assisted by a legal assessor, but that gentleman occupies only an honorary position, and does not act under official responsibility. I cannot see any advantage in encouraging the conversion of the Dean of Guild's Court into a Court for the determination of questions of heritable right, which have always been considered appropriated to the Court of Session.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion as your Lordship and Lord Adam. My only doubt was whether this question of sisting an adjoining proprietor was not a question entirely for the discretion of the Dean of Guild. It is the duty of a petitioner in a process like the present to call all the immediately adjoining proprietors, but if others more remote desire to be heard, it rather appears to me to be very much a question of discretion whether they should be allowed to appear or should be left to their other legal remedies. My doubt has been removed mainly by this consideration, that the appellant craved to be sisted before the record was closed, and his appearance therefore would not have been the cause of any delay in the proceedings. I quite assent to the view that feuars are not entitled to drop in at any time, and so delay proceedings which are in their nature summary, but I do not think that the appellant is in that position. On the whole therefore I agree in thinking that the appellant ought to have been admitted.

No. 215.
July 15, 1891.
Lawrie v. Jackson.

THE COURT recalled the Dean of Guild's interlocutor, and remitted to him to sist the appellant, and proceed with the cause.

T. J. GORDON & FALCONER, W.S.—CURROR, COWPER, & CURROR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 216.
July 14, 1891.
Hairsten's Judicial Factor v. Duncan.

DAVID M'KETTRICK (Hairsten's Judicial Factor), Pursuer (Real Raiser). MRS ANNIE MILLER M'GOWAN or DUNCAN AND OTHERS, Claimants (Reclaimers).—Johnston—W. Campbell. MRS JESSIE LITTLE or MARTIN AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Martin. JAMES M'WHIR HAIRSTEN AND OTHERS, Claimants (Respondents).—Jameson—C. N. Johnston.

Succession—Construction—"Survivors."—A testator directed his trustees upon his death to secure and lend upon good and sufficient bonds, payable to themselves, the sum of £700 in trust for behoof of each of his five daughters in liferent allenarly, and the lawful issue of each in fee. The deed provided that "in case any one or more of my said daughters shall die before me, or die without leaving lawful issue of her or their bodies, the sum or sums provided and intended for them and theirs as aforesaid, not only the original sum so provided, but the sum or sums accrescing to her or them by virtue of the present clause, shall appertain and accresce to the survivor or survivors of my said daughters in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and to their issue and children, share and share alike, in fee. . . ." The deed further provided that at the request of any of his daughters, the trustees were to invest her £700 in the purchase of lands or houses, and were to take the titles to her in liferent allenarly and her issue in fee, "whom failing, to my said other daughters in liferent, and their respective issue and children in fee, in case of their death or their dying without leaving such issue and children, as in manner before mentioned." The testator left the residue of his estate to his sons.

Held that on the death of a daughter without issue her provision fell to her surviving sisters in liferent and their respective children in fee (children of predeceasing sisters being excluded), and that on the death of the last surviving sister without issue, the fee of the fund liferented by her fell into residue.

Forrest's Trustees v. Rae, Dec. 20, 1884, 12 R. 389, followed.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. M.

THOMAS HAIRSTENS of Maxwellton, died in 1827, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 26th December 1822, and a codicil thereto dated 22d September 1823.

By his trust-disposition and settlement he disponed to trustees his whole estate, heritable and moveable. In the fourth place, he directed his trustees to pay to each of his five daughters by name a sum of £700 on their attaining majority. In the sixth purpose, he directed his trustees, as soon after his death as was prudent, and after payment of his debts, &c., and after payment or proper security obtained for the daughters' provisions, to pay and convey the residue of his estate equally among his three sons, Thomas, John, and James, always under burden of the annuities to his widow and brother.

The codicil, after narrating the provisions previously made in his settlement in favour of his daughters, bore,—"Upon farther consideration it has occurred to me that the provisions therein granted in favour of my

No. 216.
July 14, 1891.
Hairsten's Judicial Factor v. Duncan.

said daughters should be destined and left in a different manner, therefore I have recalled, and hereby revoke and recall, the foresaid provisions conceived in their favour, with the whole conditions and declarations thereunto attached, and in place thereof I have provided for them as follows, viz.: I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees and their foresaids, immediately upon my decease, and from the first and readiest of my funds, to secure and lend out upon good and sufficient bonds payable to themselves the sum of £700 sterling, in trust for the use and behoof of my said daughter Agnes Hairstens, and the like sum of £700 sterling for use and behoof of each of my other said daughters Jane Hairstens, Barbara Hairstens, Margaret Hairstens, and Ann Hairstens, and for each other daughter which may be procreated of my present marriage, in liferent respectively for their liferent use allenarly, and for the use and behoof of the lawful issue and children of each of my said daughters, share and share alike, in fee, with interest thereof from the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur after my decease, to which interest I hereby declare they and each of them shall be entitled: And in case any one or more of my said daughters shall die before me, or die without leaving lawful issue of her or their bodies, the sum or sums provided and intended for them and theirs as aforesaid, not only the original sum so provided, but the sum or sums accrescing to her or them by virtue of the present clause, shall appertain and accresce to the survivor or survivors of my said daughters in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to their issue and children, share and share alike, in fee,—that is, the issue and children of each daughter shall receive no more than an equal share of what would have fallen to the issue and children of the daughter or daughters predeceasing or dying without issue and children: Declaring always that my said daughters shall be consulted by my said trustees and their foresaids, not only in effecting the loan of the foresaid several sums for behoof of themselves and their respective families, but also that the same when secured shall not be uplifted or discharged without their consent: Providing and declaring nevertheless that my said trustees and their foresaids shall, when demanded, and at the request and with the advice and consent of my said daughters, or any of them, for their and their families' respective interest in the premises, be bound and obliged to invest each of the several principal sums provided to them and their aforesaids in the purchase of lands or houses, and that my said trustees and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged to take the rights and investitures of the lands or houses so to be purchased in liferent to my said daughter or daughters, for her or their liferent use allenarly, and to her or their lawful issue and children in fee, and whom failing, to my said other daughters in liferent, and their respective issue and children in fee, in case of their death, or their dying without leaving such issue and children, as in manner before mentioned."

Mr Hairstens was survived by the five daughters, and after his death the provisions in their favour were invested on heritable security by the trustees, and the interest on these provisions was paid over to them as it fell due in terms of the settlement.

The daughters died upon the following dates:—Jean (Mrs M'Gowan), in 1864, Agnes in 1867, Margaret (Mrs Martin) in 1881, Barbara in 1889, and Ann in 1890.

Mrs M'Gowan and Mrs Martin left issue, the others dying unmarried.

In an action of multiplepoinding raised on 15th January 1891 by David M'Kettrick, judicial factor on the trust-estate, in order to ascertain to what persons the funds liferented by the three unmarried daughters of the testator was payable, claims were lodged for the issue of Mrs M'Gowan

No. 216.
July 14, 1891.
Hairsten's Judicial Factor v. Duncan.

and Mrs Martin on the one hand, and for certain representatives of the testator's three sons, the residuary legatees under the settlement, on the other.

The former claimants maintained that the fee of the shares liferented by the unmarried daughters was carried to them by the destination in the codicil. The latter claimants maintained that the fee was destined only to the issue of daughters who survived the predeceasing daughters, and that therefore the fee of the shares liferented by the testator's unmarried daughters fell into residue, with the exception of one-third of the share of Agnes, which fell to the issue of Mrs Martin, who had survived Agnes.

On 20th May 1891, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and codicil, the fee of the provision of a daughter of the truster dying without issue is destined to the issue of daughters of the truster surviving the daughter so dying, to the exclusion of the issue of daughters predeceasing her: Therefore repels the claim of Mrs Annie Miller M'Gowan or Duncan and others: Sustains the first claim for Mrs Jessie Little or Martin and others [as regards a third part of the provision of the truster's daughter Agnes], and repels that claim quoad ultra: Finds that the fund in medio, except so far as the claim of Mrs Jessie Little or Martin and others thereto has been sustained, falls to be paid to the truster's three sons, Thomas Hairstens, John Hairstens, and James Hairstens, being his residuary legatees; and appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure."*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . I was at first strongly under the impression that the truster's intention was to secure the whole of the five sums of £700 to his daughters and their issue, and to exclude the residuary legatees from the whole sum of £3500 so long as there existed issue of any of the daughters. That appeared to me to be in accordance with the scheme of the trust-deed, of which the codicil is merely a modification; and it seemed prima facie reasonable to suppose that the testator would favour equally the issue of daughters predeceasing and the issue of surviving daughters. That impression has not been wholly removed; but on more careful consideration of the words of the codicil I have come to think that it is impossible to give effect to it consistently with any fair interpretation of the codicil.

"I think there can be no doubt that the term 'survivor' in the clause of accretion which has been quoted has reference to the unmarried daughter who is supposed to have died, and whose provision is in question. It is her survivor who is intended. But it seems to me that there is at first sight a possible or apparent ambiguity in the clause, because the antecedent to the latter relative, 'their,' may possibly be either the word 'daughters' or the words 'survivor or survivors of daughters,' and, therefore, it is not impossible to read the clause as importing either a destination to the survivors of the daughters in liferent and the issue of these survivors in fee, or a destination to the survivors of the daughters in liferent and to the issue of all the daughters, whether surviving or predeceasing, in fee. Out of that ambiguity the present question has apparently arisen. Had the words used been 'surviving daughters' instead of the survivors of daughters, there would have been no ambiguity at all, and perhaps this question might not have arisen.

"But on careful consideration I have come to think that there is no substantial ambiguity and no real doubt as to the manner in which the clause must be construed, and that the latter interpretation is really inadmissible.

"Although it is not wholly impossible to construe the destination 'to the survivors of my daughters in liferent and their issue in fee,' as a destination of the fee to the issue of all daughters surviving and predeceasing, such a construction would be extremely forced and strained. According to any natural or ordinary

No. 216.

July 14, 1891.

Hairsten's Judicial Factor v. Duncan.

The issue of Mrs M'Gowan reclaimed, and argued;—The testator's obvious intention was that shares of the daughters who died without construction the words 'their issue' must bear reference to the individuals previously specified on whom the liferent had been conferred, that is to say, to the survivors of the daughters. The truster contemplated five separate investments, one in favour of each daughter, and it is plain from the codicil that he regarded the sums which would accresce on the death of a daughter without issue simply as additions to the original provision, and as falling under the destination which governed that provision. I think it clear that he meant that the sum, whether original or accrescing, of which a daughter should have the liferent, should stand destined to her issue in fee. But that could not happen if the liferents accresced to the surviving daughters only, and the fee to the issue not only of surviving daughters but of predeceasing daughters also. For example, there is no doubt that on the death of Agnes the liferent of her provision was divisible into three parts, and Mrs Martin was entitled to the liferent of a third, but the fee if not confined to the issue of surviving daughters would be divisible into four parts. So that Mrs Martin would have the liferent of one-third, but her issue the direct right to the fee of a fourth only. That would be a result which appears inconsistent with the language of the codicil and with the idea that the accrescing funds should be simply an addition to the original provision. On the whole, I think that the exclusion of the issue of predeceasing daughters is expressed so plainly in this clause that that view of it must of necessity be adopted unless the indications of a contrary intention are unmistakeable.

"It was argued on behalf of the issue of Mrs M'Gowan and Mrs Martin that this was a case in which the word 'survivor' should be read as synonymous with 'other.' But I confess I have not been able to see the force or application of that suggestion. It is no doubt not only possible, but absolutely certain, that the words 'survivor' and 'other,' when used in this deed in reference to daughters, are absolutely synonymous, because what is conferred on a daughter is a liferent; but the effect of that identification is not to enlarge the meaning of the word 'survivor,' but to restrict the meaning of the word 'other.' It shews that daughters may, or rather must, mean surviving daughters, but it does not shew that surviving daughters or other daughters can include daughters who were not survivors.

"Up to this point I can see no difference between this case and the case of Forrest's Trustees v. Rae, 20th December 1884, 12 R. 389, where the Court dealing with a destination in all points similar refused to hold that the words 'issue of survivors' could include issue of predeceasers. The reported argument in that case is almost the same as the argument which was addressed to me, and I would be bound to follow that case as a precedent unless this case could be distinguished.

"Counsel for the issue referred to the case of Ramsay's Trustees v. Ramsay, 21st December 1876, 4 R. 243, which also bears a very striking resemblance to this case, and where the Court preferred the issue of predeceasing legatees, notwithstanding that the destination was to the issue of surviving legatees in a question with parties pleading intestacy. In that case the provision dealt not as here with specific sums, but with the whole estate, and the only alternative against the claim of the issue was intestacy, which was said to be inconsistent with the manifest plan of the truster's settlement. Here, by reason of the residuary clause, there is no question about intestacy. It was said by the Judges in Forrest's case that their judgment was not inconsistent with the judgment in the case of Ramsay's Trustees. I am not sure that I see the exact grounds on which the apparent conflict between the two cases is satisfactorily displaced. But I think that I must regard the case of Forrest as the more binding on me, both because it seems to me to come closer to the present case, and also for the simple reason that it is the later judgment.

"There are, however, two passages in the codicil in this case which did not occur in the settlement under consideration in Forrest's case. The one is a kind of explanatory clause which comes immediately after the clause of accretion,

No. 216. July 14, 1891. Hairsten's Judicial Factor v. Duncan.

issue were to be divided equally among the families of the whole of his daughters. Under the clause at the end of the deed any daughter might demand that the trustees should invest her £700 in the price of a house or in land. Supposing Agnes had done this, the trustees would have had to take the title to her in liferent allenarly, and to the whole of her sisters in liferent, and to their respective issue in fee. Under such a destination, the issue of Mrs M'Gowan would have taken as well as the issue of Mrs Martin. The case of Forrest's Trustees[1] had no such clause to shew that the word "survivor" was not meant to have its literal meaning. Further, the competition was not as here between the issue of predeceasing daughters and residuary legatees, but between the issue of surviving and predeceasing children. It was quite open in such a case and it is as follows:—'That is the issue and children of each daughter shall receive no more than an equal share of what would have fallen to the issue and children of the daughter or daughters predeceasing or dying without issue and children.'

---

"There was not much said in argument about this clause, which is certainly surprisingly obscure, and of which no very satisfactory interpretation was suggested. It is manifestly defective, because while the words 'no more than an equal share' imply a comparison with something else, the other term of the comparison is not expressed at all, and the clause has no meaning without supplying it. If it could be held to be intended that the share of the issue of one child should not exceed the share of the issue of any other child, such a construction would strongly support the case for the issue. But I am not prepared to read the clause in that way, and so to overbear the much more distinctly expressed clause of accretion. I think it is easier to suppose that the object of the clause was to provide that the family of one surviving daughter should take no more than the family of another surviving daughter, whatever difference there might be in the size of the families; in other words, to declare that the division should be per stirpes, which would be consistent with the clause of accretion.

"The other clause in the codicil is to the effect that if any of the daughters should desire it, the trustees should invest her £700 in the price of a house or in land, and if they did so, they should take the title to the daughter in liferent allenarly and her issue in fee, whom failing, to the truster's 'said other daughters in liferent, and their respective issue in fee, in case of their death without leaving such issue and children as in manner before mentioned.' That is to say, that if, for example, a house had been bought with the £700 provided for Agnes, the title would have been taken to Agnes in liferent allenarly, and to Jean (Mrs M'Gowan), Margaret, Barbara, and Anne in liferent, and to their respective issue in fee. It was argued that the case fell to be decided as if such investments had been made and titles taken; and in that I agree,—and that under such a destination the issue of Mrs M'Gowan would have taken as well as the issue of Mrs Martin. But the whole codicil must be read together, and having regard to the distinct declaration in the primary clause of accretion in favour of the issue of survivors—to which this latter clause refers back—I am disposed to think that under such a clause the issue of Mrs M'Gowan could not have taken.

"On the whole, I am driven unwillingly to the conclusion that in this case I must follow the decision in the case of Forrest, from which I cannot see that this case can be safely distinguished. I come to this conclusion with hesitation and some regret, because I cannot resist the suspicion that it may not be the conclusion which the truster himself would have reached. . . .

"I think it follows that the third part of the provision of Agnes which fell to Mrs Martin and her issue became part of the original provision to her and them, and was on Mrs Martin's death payable to her issue along with the capital of the original £700. . . ."

[1] Forrest's Trustees v. Rae, &c., Dec. 20, 1884, 12 R. 389.

No. 216.
July 14, 1891.
Hairstens Judicial Factor v. Duncan.

as this, in order to avoid defeating the truster's plain intention, to read "survivors" as equivalent to "others," as had been done in Ramsay v. Ramsay's Trustees.[1] The matter has been subject of much discussion in England, and although the Courts there had sometimes given a strict meaning to the word "survivor," while suspicious that such was not meant by the testator, they had frequently taken the merest sign of a contrary intention in order to evade a strict construction.[2] The issue of Mrs Martin concurred in the above argument.

Argued for the representatives of the residuary legatees;—The general rule was that the words of a settlement were to receive their ordinary natural meaning unless there was a very strong reason to the contrary. The argument of the parties representing Mrs M'Gowan and Mrs Martin was founded solely on the clause in the deed as to the daughters' right to have their share of the fund settled on them nominatim. That clause, however, fell to be read along with the prior and fuller declaration contained in the clause of accretion. There was no difference between this case and Forrest's Trustees. The case of Ramsay's Trustees was inapplicable. The dicta there had reference to the circumstances of that particular case which would have been one of intestacy, had the decision been otherwise. The word "survivors" must then receive its ordinary natural meaning, and therefore the issue of the predeceasing daughters fell to be excluded.[3]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Mr Hairstens of Maxwellton died in 1827, and directed the trustees under his trust-disposition and codicil to invest £700 in trust for behoof of each of his daughters in liferent allenarly, and of their issue in fee.

The provision applicable to this, and which requires construction, is as follows:—"In case any one or more of my said daughters shall die before me, or die without leaving lawful issue of her or their bodies," the sum provided for her and her issue "shall appertain and accresce to the survivor or survivors of my said daughters in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and to their issue and children, share and share alike, in fee."

Now, what happened was this—One of the daughters, Mrs M'Gowan, died in 1864, leaving issue; Agnes died unmarried in 1867; Mrs Martin died in 1881, leaving issue; and two other daughters, Barbara and Anne, died unmarried in 1889 and 1890, respectively.

The question raised here is one between the issue of Mrs M'Gowan and Mrs Martin and the representatives of Mr Hairstens' residuary legatees under his trust-deed, these legatees being his three sons.

The former maintain that under the above destination the fee of the several sums of £700 is carried to the issue of Mrs M'Gowan and Mrs Martin, although Mrs M'Gowan predeceased all her unmarried sisters, and Mrs Martin only survived one of them. On the other hand, the residuary legatees maintain that the fee is destined only to the issue of such of the daughters who survived the predeceasing daughters, and that therefore the issue of Mrs M'Gowan, who prede-

---

[1] Ramsay v. Ramsay's Trustees, Dec. 21, 1876, 4 R. 243.

[2] Jarman on Wills, 4th ed. ii. pp. 689 et seq.

[3] Benn v. Benn, 1885, L. R., 29 Ch. Div. 839; King and Others v. Frost, 1890, L. R., 15 App. Cases, 548.

No. 216. July 14, 1891. Hairsten's Judicial Factor v. Duncan.

ceased Agnes, Barbara, and Anne, are wholly excluded, and that the issue of Mrs Martin, who survived Agnes, but predeceased Barbara and Anne, are entitled only to one-third of the £700 destined to Agnes and her issue; and they maintain that all the rest is carried by the residuary clause to the residuary legatees.

The real question is as to the meaning of the words "to the survivor or survivors of my said daughters in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and to their issue and children, share and share alike, in fee." Do they mean what they express in language, "the survivors of predeceasing daughters," or do they mean that a fee is destined to the issue of all daughters whether surviving or predeceasing?

The Lord Ordinary has gone into the legal question in an elaborate judgment, and he has come to be of opinion that he is bound to follow the case of Forrest's Trustees v. Rae. That case was decided after full deliberation, and favours the view maintained by the representatives of the residuary legatees as against that maintained by the issue of Mrs M'Gowan and Mrs Martin.

I agree with his Lordship that this case is ruled by Forrest's Trustees, and whatever may have been decided in the case of Ramsay's Trustees v. Ramsay does not in my opinion rule this case. The case of Ramsay's Trustee was earlier in date than that of Forrest's Trustees, and indeed it was referred to in the latter case, and was therefore before the Court, and was distinguished by the Judges from Forrest's case.

I am, then, for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and I agree in the reasons contained in his opinion.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the whole stands upon the very obvious fact that the last survivor of any number of daughters does not leave behind her a surviving sister.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

J. & J. GALLETLY, S.S.C.—SCOTT & GLOVER, W.S.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 217. July 14, 1891. Darling v. Gray & Sons.

JANE WOOD OR DARLING, Pursuer (Appellant).—Rhind.
. WILLIAM GRAY & SONS, Defenders (Respondents).—C. N. Johnston.

Reparation—Executor—Solatium—Competency of new action where pursuer died from his injuries after action brought.—A workman who had received injuries while working in his master's employment raised an action against him for damages. The record was closed, and issues were adjusted. Thereafter he died intestate and unmarried, and his mother was appointed his executrix, and was sisted in the action in his room. She raised against the employer another action for damages and solatium for her son's death, which she alleged to be due to the accident, and craved to have that action remitted to the same jury who were to try the first action. Held that the second action was incompetent.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians. I.

ON 23d June 1890 Alexander Darling, a mason in the employment of William Gray & Sons, builders, Edinburgh, raised, in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, an action of damages against Gray & Sons, aver-

No. 217.
July 14, 1891.
Darling v. Gray & Sons.

ring that he had received injuries while at his work by the breaking of the jib of a crane, for the defective state of which his masters were responsible.

The record in that action was closed, and, after proof was allowed, it was appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial. Issues were adjusted, and the action was remitted to Lord Low for trial.

Thereafter Darling died on 6th January 1891. He was unmarried and intestate. His mother, Jane Wood or Darling, a widow, was sisted pursuer as his executrix.

On 30th April 1891 Mrs Darling raised another action against William Gray & Sons at common law, and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, for damages and solatium for the death of her son. She averred that his death resulted from the effects of the accident, and that the accident occurred through the fault of the defenders.

The defenders narrated the raising of the previous action by Darling himself, and stated—"The said action is still pending in the Court of Session before Lord Low, Ordinary." They pleaded (1) lis alibi pendens, (2) the action is incompetent.

On 6th June 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) allowed a proof before answer.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and proposed an issue. She moved the Court to approve the issue, and to remit the action to Lord Low (Ordinary), to be tried before the same jury as should try the first action.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was admitted that one who had recovered damages for an injury could not have a second action tried simply because the injury had proved worse than he at first averred. But here the second action was to recover damages for the death of the deceased. In the other action the jury could only give to his executrix the damages which he himself had suffered. The claims were therefore different and independent. The fact that the deceased was prosecuting one of them at his decease was not a good answer to the claim made for satisfaction of the other.

Argued for the defenders;—The mother's action was incompetent in respect of the depending suit founded upon the same cause of action. The principle was the same as was applied in the case of Stevenson.[1] There could be no new action because a new result had emerged. That was well settled in England also.[2]

LORD YOUNG.—The question has been argued as one of interest and of importance. I think it is so, but I think it is not difficult, and I have come to a clear opinion upon it. It seems that this man Darling was injured through the fault, as he alleged, of the defenders. He brought an action against them upon that footing. It was in dependence at his death—the record having been closed. When he died his executrix, his mother, was sisted as pursuer in that action. There is no doubt of her right to continue it as he might have done if he had lived.

But she has also brought a second action, on the ground that she has suffered loss as an individual by his death. In considering that, I take no account of the peculiar circumstances in which the death occurred. I am assuming that the [1] Stevenson v. Pontifex & Wood, Dec. 7, 1887, 15 R. 125; M'Master v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 27, 1885, 13 R. 252.

[2] Addison on Torts, 54.

No. 217.
July 14, 1891.
Darling v. Gray & Sons.

death is to be referred to the accident, and I take the general case that the sufferer from an accident having died after raising the action his executrix brings an action upon the footing that she who is suing the action raised by the deceased is entitled also to sue a second action as being individually a sufferer by the death. It is a question of novelty whether that is competent. I am clearly of opinion that it is not.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the action as incompetent.

D. HOWARD SMITH, Solicitor—T. & W. A. M'LAREN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 218.
July 14, 1891.
Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

THE HERITABLE REVERSIONARY COMPANY, LIMITED, First Parties.—Johnston—Shennan.

ROBERT COCKBURN MILLAR (M'Kay's Trustee), Second Party.—Lorimer—Hunter.

Bankruptcy—Vesting of heritable estate in trustee—Latent trust—Tantum et tale—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (Act 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 102.*—Held (diss. Lord M'Laren) that a sequestration vests in the trustee for behoof of the creditors heritage to which the bankrupt holds an unqualified feudal title in his own name, although he holds it only in trust for the true owner.

1ST DIVISION. C.

THE HERITABLE REVERSIONARY COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts in 1880, its object being, inter alia, to acquire land or houses or other property for the purpose of holding or reselling it.

Daniel Smith M'Kay acted as its manager down to February 1886. On 17th May 1882 he bought certain tenements of houses for £2150, and they were subsequently conveyed to him by disposition, on which he was infeft on 14th September 1882. The purchase was made for

* The 102d section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacted as follows:—"The act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee shall ipso jure transfer to and vest in him or any succeeding trustee, for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, at the date of the sequestration, with all right, title, and interest, the whole property of the debtor, to the effect following:— . . . 2. Vesting of Heritable Estate in Scotland.—The whole heritable estate belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland, to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration, and as if a poinding of the ground had then been executed, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null and reducible, and the creditors' right to poind the ground as hereinafter provided; and the right of the trustee shall not be challengeable on the ground of any prior inhibition (saving the effect which such inhibition may be entitled to in the ranking of the creditors): Provided always that such transfer and vesting of the heritable estate shall have no effect upon the rights of the superior, nor upon any question of succession between the heir and executor of any creditor claiming on the sequestrated estate, nor upon the rights of the creditors of the ancestor (except that the act and warrant of confirmation shall operate in their favour as complete diligence); and if any part of the bankrupt's estate be held under an entail, or by a title otherwise limited, the right vested in the trustee shall be effectual only to the extent of the interest in the estate which the bankrupt might legally convey or the creditors attach."

No. 218.
July 14, 1891.
Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

behoof of the Reversionary Company, but ex facie of the disposition they were not parties to the purchase. Neither were they parties to a bond and disposition in security which M'Kay granted over the subjects for part of the purchase price.

M'Kay's estates were sequestrated in December 1890, and Mr R. C. Millar was appointed trustee.

In these circumstances, the questions arose whether the subjects in question, being absolutely vested in him, formed part of his sequestrated estate and passed to the trustee for his creditors, or whether the Reversionary Company were entitled to vindicate their right to the property.

In a special case to which the Reversionary Company were first parties, and M'Kay's trustee was second party, these questions were put:—"(1) Whether the second party, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of the said Daniel Smith M'Kay, took said subjects which were vested ex facie absolutely in the bankrupt, free of the latent trust in favour of the first parties, and whether the first parties are entitled only to rank on the sequestrated estate for the value of the subjects, or were entitled to recover said subjects from the second party as their own property? (2) Whether the surplus price of said subjects belongs to the second party as trustee foresaid, or to the first parties?"

The case stated;—The purchase was made by M'Kay for behoof of the Reversionary Company, and on the instructions of the directors of that company. This appears from the minutes of meeting of the shareholders of the company held on 21st June 1882, and in accounts of intromissions kept by M'Kay as manager of the company, periodically rendered to the directors, and engrossed in the minute-book of the company. Further, M'Kay, shortly after he ceased to act as manager of the company, executed a declaration of trust, dated 17th May 1886, to the effect that he held the subjects in trust only for behoof of the Heritable Reversionary Company.* The purchase price of the subjects was provided as follows:—(First) M'Kay granted a bond and disposition in security over the subjects, in ordinary form, in favour of certain lenders for £1450, dated 3d August 1882, and 14th September 1882; and (secondly) the balance of the price, amounting to £700, was provided by the Reversionary Company out of rents collected by the company, and sums deposited on loan with the said company by certain of its shareholders. The Reversionary Company were not ex facie of the deeds above referred to parties to the purchase of said subjects or to the bond and disposition in security granted over the same. The declaration of trust was not recorded in the Register of Sasines, and there was nothing appearing on the public records to shew that the company were connected with or in

* The declaration of trust was, inter alia, as follows:—"Considering that said subjects are held by me in trust as after mentioned, and that I have been requested to grant the declaration of trust after written; therefore, I hereby confess and declare that I hold the said subjects in trust only for behoof of the Heritable Reversionary Company, Limited, and I bind and oblige myself and my heirs and successors, whenever required to do so by them, and on being reimbursed of all expenses incurred by me in connection with the said subjects, and being relieved of all obligations which I have undertaken thereanent, to denude myself of the foresaid trust, and for that purpose to grant, subscribe, and deliver a formal and valid disposition or conveyance of the said subjects in favour of any person or persons whom the said the Heritable Reversionary Company, Limited, may name, and that under a penalty of £500 sterling, over and above performance."

No. 218.
July 14, 1891.
Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

any way interested in the property. The company, however, or their manager for the time, in point of fact, managed the property, and collected the rents thereof, and from the year 1882-83 down to the present date the company was entered in the Valuation-roll of the burgh of Leith, and in the several assessment rolls prepared from the Valuation-roll, as proprietors of the subjects. M'Kay did not interfere in the management or intromit with the rents, except for behoof of the company, and only during the period that he acted as their manager.

It was further stated that the property in question had been sold of consent of parties, and that, after paying off the bond, there remained a surplus of about £365, which was consigned in bank to await the decision of the Court.

Argued for the first parties;—There was no question that if equitable considerations were to prevail, the subjects belonged to them, and they were entitled to the surplus. As regarded moveable property, the trustee in a bankrupt estate took it tantum et tale as it stood in the bankrupt. That this was the law in regard to personal estate there could be no doubt. The 102d section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, transferred to the bankrupt's trustee "the whole heritable estate belonging to the bankrupt." But the property in question could not be held to be such, because the bankrupt could not have disposed of it without committing a breach of trust. The trust under which he held the property qualified and was inherent in the right which vested in the trustee. He took the estate subject to all latent equities to which the bankrupt was subject, and adjudging creditors "must take the right of their debtor tantum et tale as it was in his person."[1] No doubt Professor Bell in his Commentaries[2] had expressed himself to the effect that where land was vested in an individual, with the view that he should hold as trustee for a company, the condition of the right was unavailing, if it did not appear on the record, and this view was borne out by some of the older cases.[3] But in view of the fact that, if Professor Bell was right in his interpretation of these cases, it would lead, as in this case, to the greatest injustice, they were worthy of reconsideration. The law would admittedly be different in the case of bona fide purchasers or mortgagees. It was for their protection that the system of public records and the efficacy which attached to them had been introduced. There was justice in according absolute safety to a purchaser or to a mortgagee who bought or lent on the faith of the records. The case of an ordinary creditor was distinct. He only trusted to the personal credit of his debtor, and knew nothing of the state of any title-deeds which he might happen to have. This distinction was taken by Lord Westbury in his Lordship's opinion in the case of Fleeming v. Howden.[4] Further, the property in question had always been managed by the company, who had themselves drawn the rents, and had thus been in possession both before and after M'Kay had ceased to be manager. The right of property had therefore effectually vested in the company,[5] and

---

[1] Thomson v. Douglas, Heron, & Co., 1786, M. 10,229.

[2] Bell's Comms. 5th ed. i. 282, 7th ed. i. 301.

[3] Wylie v. Duncan, 1803, M. 10,269; Russell and Others v. Ross' Creditors, 1792, M. 10,300; Mitchells v. Ferguson, 1781, M. 10,296, and Lord Hailes' Decns. 879; Jeffrey v. Paul, May 15, 1835, 1 S. and M'L. 767; Goudy on Bankruptcy, 251.

[4] Fleeming v. Howden, July 16, 1868, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113, at p. 121, 40 Scot. Jur. 616; Graeme's Trustee v. Giersberg, June 1, 1888, 15 R. 691; Molleson v. Challis, March 11, 1873, 11 Macph. 510, 45 Scot. Jur. 328.

[5] Watson v. Duncan, July 12, 1879, 6 R. 1247.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

it could not be said, in the words of the 102d section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, that this was "property belonging to the bankrupt."

Argued for the second party;—It was a long-established rule in the law of Scotland that a person, whether creditor or purchaser, dealing with a proprietor who had completed his infeftment, was entitled to rely upon the public records. Any condition or limitation of the right which did not appear there could not receive effect.[1] The doctrine of tantum et tale had no application to the case of real rights completed by infeftment. No analogy could be drawn from the cases of moveable property such as a ship, the title to which required registration, and such authorities as that of Watson v. Duncan[2] were entirely inapplicable. The maxim assignatus utitur jure auctoris did not apply to the transmission of heritable estate.[3]

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The parties to this case are, in the first place, the Heritable Reversionary Company, Limited, and in the second place, the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Daniel Smith M'Kay.

It appears that M'Kay was sequestrated on 2d December 1890, and that he was then infeft in certain houses in Balfour Street, Edinburgh, as absolute proprietor, conform to disposition thereof in his favour, recorded in the Register of Sasines on 14th September 1882. These subjects, however, were in fact held by him in trust for the Reversionary Company, in whose favour he had executed a declaration of trust dated 17th May 1886. It is made matter of statement in the case that this declaration of trust was not recorded in the Register of Sasines, and that there was nothing appearing in the public records to shew that the company were connected with or in any way interested in the property. It is in these circumstances that we are asked whether the trustee on M'Kay's sequestrated estate took the property free from the latent trust in favour of the Reversionary Company, or whether he took it tantum et tale as it stood in the person of the bankrupt, and affected by that trust.

The question primarily depends on the vesting clause of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (sec. 102), which provides that the Act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee shall ipso jure transfer to and vest in him, for behoof of creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, the whole heritable estate belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication in payment and in security of debt subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee and recorded at the date of the sequestration, and as if a poinding of the ground had then been executed, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null and reducible, and the creditors' right to poind the ground—and at the end of the section there is the qualification that if any part of the bankrupt's estate

[1] Bell's Comms. 5th ed. i. 282, 7th ed. i. 301; Wylie v. Duncan, 1803, M. 10,300; Russell and Others v. Ross' Creditors, 1792, M. 10,300; Mitchells v. Ferguson, 1781, M. 10,296, and Hailes' Decns. 879; Jeffrey v. Paul, Nov. 29, 1831, 10 S. 75, 4 Scot. Jur. 149, and (H. L.), May 15, 1835, 1 S. and M'L. 767, 7 Scot. Jur. 530; Mansfield v. Walker's Trustees, June 28, 1833, 11 S. 813, 5 Scot. Jur. 569, affd. April 10, 1835, 1 S. and M'L. 203, per Lord Brougham, 333; Laurie v. Laurie, March 10, 1854, 16 D. 860, 26 Scot. Jur. 383.

[2] Supra, p. 1168, note 5.

[3] Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, July 14, 1876, 3 R. 1078.

No. 218. July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

be held under an entail, or by a title otherwise limited, the right vested in the trustee shall be effectual only to the extent of the interest in the estate which the bankrupt might legally convey or the creditors attach.

It cannot, I think, be maintained that this property was held by the bankrupt on a title limited so as to prevent him from legally conveying it, or, so far as I can see, creditors from attaching it. The bankrupt's title was not ex facie limited in any way, and I do not understand it to be disputed that he could have given a perfectly good title to a disponee free from the latent trust. But it was said that a creditor, and therefore the bankrupt's trustee as having the same rights as a creditor, could not attach it except under burden of the trust, but must take it tantum et tale as it stood in the person of the bankrupt.

I understand that this is maintained on the ground that the trust was an inherent qualification of the bankrupt's right, and therefore affected the subjects in the hands of anyone deriving right from or through the bankrupt.

If the trust be an inherent qualification of the bankrupt's right, it is difficult to see why it should not affect the subjects in the hands of a disponee as well as of a creditor. But however that may be, in my opinion the doctrine of tantum et tale has no application in the case of real rights perfected by sasine.

I have always understood that any person, whether creditor or purchaser, dealing with a proprietor infeft, was entitled to rely on the public records, and was not affected by any qualification, burden, or condition on the real right not there appearing. It appears to me that to give effect to the claim of the Reversionary Company would be to violate this well-settled principle—and I see no reason why an exception should be made in the case of a latent trust any more than in the case of any other latent qualification or obligation of an ex facie absolute proprietor.

On this subject Mr Bell in his Commentaries (i. 300), says,—"A right as it stands in the bankrupt's person may be limited or qualified by certain conditions and stipulations, and in general the qualification, if inherent in the constitution of the right and apparent on the face of it, is effectual against third parties." Then, after stating the difficulty of distinguishing between conditions limiting the right of the holder and those which resolve into mere personal obligations, he adds,—"But wherever the right itself is qualified or limited, the condition is effectual," with certain exceptions. He then states the exceptions, and the first which he states is that "of real rights to lands where the limitation does not appear in the infeftment." Then he adds, I think quite accurately,—"The statutes relative to the records have the effect of protecting creditors and purchasers against such burdens and qualifications of the real right of a proprietor infeft as are not of the nature of a radical defect in his title." One of the illustrations which he gives of the application of this doctrine is the case we have here,—"Where lands and houses are vested in one individual intending that he shall hold as trustee for a company." In support of this doctrine Mr Bell refers to the case of Wylie v. Duncan, M. 10,269.

In this case Wylie disponed to Archibald absolutely certain subjects at a price. At the same date Archibald granted to Wylie a missive obliging himself to redispone the subjects to him on repayment of the price, and upon being allowed the expense of repairs and meliorations. Archibald was infeft on this disposition.

Wylie remained in possession, and there is no doubt that the transaction was one of loan.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891.

Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

Archibald, the disponee, was sequestrated, and the question arose between Duncan, the trustee on his sequestrated estate, who claimed the subjects, and Wylie, the disponer, who claimed to be entitled to redeem them on repayment of the price, and who pleaded that the trustee could only take them tantum et tale as they stood in the person of the bankrupt. The decision was, that the Lords considered the burden as personal, and not good against creditors.

I cannot distinguish that case from the present. In both cases the bankrupt was infeft absolutely in the subjects, and in both cases he was under a personal obligation to convey on certain conditions the subjects to the true owner. That the conditions were different on which the bankrupt was bound to redispone does not appear to me to make any difference in principle.

In the case of Fleeming v. Howden, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113, to which we were referred, an heir of entail in possession and infeft in an estate was bound to denude in favour of the next heir of entail on succeeding to a peerage. He succeeded to the peerage, and some months afterwards died without having denuded himself of the estate. The trustees for his creditors claimed the estate, but the House of Lords repelled the claim, holding that he, the heir in possession, held the estate in trust for the next heir from the date of his succession to the peerage.

The present question, however, did not arise for decision in that case, because the trust was patent on the face of the title. Lord Cranworth, who delivered the leading judgment, says,—"This was apparent on the face of the title as recorded in the Register of Sasines, and any person becoming his creditor after that event must have known, if he looked to that register, that he was trusting a person who was no longer tenant in tail, for an event had occurred which made it his duty to denude in favour of another person."

But the case is important in respect of the view expressed in the House of Lords, that an obligation to do an act with respect to property creates a trust in the holder. If that be so, I do not see that any distinction can be maintained between the present case and Wylie v. Duncan, because in that view the bankrupt in Wylie's case was as much a trustee as the bankrupt in this case.

But I think, further, that the question raised in the present case was decided in the House of Lords in the case of Paul v. Jeffrey, 1 S. and M'L. 767.

That case related to three bonds and dispositions in security for £3000, £400, and £1925 respectively. It appears that a certain William Harley, having become insolvent, granted a conveyance of his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to certain trustees for the purpose of selling them and applying the proceeds in payment of the expenses of the trust, the advances made by them, and of paying the balance to the truster.

The three bonds in question were all granted by purchasers of portions of the trust property in security of payment of part of the purchase price.

The bond for £3000 was taken in the names of two of the trustees, James Cook and Archibald Cuthill, but privatis nominibus, and not as trustees. The bond for £400 was also taken in the names of Cook and Cuthill and of another trustee Henry Paul, but also as individuals, and not as trustees. The bond for £1925 was taken in names of the same three trustees, but expressly as trustees. It was not disputed that the bonds were in fact the property of the trust.

Cuthill became bankrupt and was sequestrated, and a Mr Jeffrey was appointed trustee on his sequestrated estates.

The two solvent trustees Cook and Paul raised an action in which, inter alia, they claimed right to the three bonds,

No. 218.

July 14, 1891.
Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

The trustee on Cuthill's sequestrated estate put in defences, in which he maintained that as the bonds for £3000 and £400 were taken in favour of Cuthill as an individual, and appeared so on the Register of Sasines, he, on behalf of the creditors, was entitled to the benefit of them to the extent of Cuthill's share, and that the alleged trust was of no relevancy in a question with him.

This plea was not given effect to in the Court of Session, in which an interlocutor was pronounced finding "that the sums contained in the securities are applicable, in the first place, for payment of the outstanding debts of the trust"; in the second place, in relief of any superadvances made by Cook, &c., thereby affirming, as it appears to me, that the bonds for £3000 and £400, although standing partly in the name of Cuthill as an individual, were yet to be considered as the property of the trust, and liable for the trust debts. The case, however, was appealed by Jeffrey to the House of Lords, with the result that this interlocutor was varied, and it was declared that the "said appellant is entitled and ought to receive one third part or share of the principal sum of £400 contained in the heritable bond by William Ewing in the said proceedings mentioned, with a proportionate part or share of such interest as may have been received or may be due and payable thereupon." No reasons are given for the judgment, but the judgment itself appears to me clearly to import that the right of Cuthill's trustee was held not to be affected by the latent trust in the person of Cuthill. I see no other ground on which the judgment can be rested.

But if this be so, the question occurs, why the same principle was not applied to the bond for £3000 which was also taken to the trustees as individuals. I have read the session papers, and the reason is no doubt that the bond for £3000 was not granted for an independent debt of that amount, but merely in corroboration for a prior debt of £3000, which had been created a real burden in favour of the trustees over the portion of the trust property sold by them to the granters of the bond, and with which it was identified.

It appears to me therefore that the present question was decided in the House of Lords in the case of Jeffrey v. Paul, and I am of opinion, both on authority and principle, that the trustee on M'Kay's sequestrated estate is entitled to the subjects in question free from the latent trust in the person of the bankrupt.

Lord M'Laren.—Without attempting a full discussion of the question in issue, I should desire to state my reasons for respectfully, but very firmly, dissenting from the judgment proposed.

If it were possible to approach this question uninfluenced by the supposed tendency of previous decisions and professional impressions, I can hardly conceive that a Court of justice would give countenance to the proposal to divide trust property amongst the creditors of a trustee.

It is true that where a trustee is infeft in trust-estate on an ex facie absolute title, and afterwards sells or mortgages this property, dealing with it as his own, the title of the purchaser or mortgagee will be sustained against the competing claim of the truster or beneficiary. For this apparently inequitable conclusion two reasons may be given—First, because it is the act of the truster that has enabled the trustee to commit the fraud, and it is therefore considered proper that the loss should fall on him rather than on the innocent purchaser or mortgagee who has advanced his money in reliance on the apparently unqualified title of the granter of the conveyance to him. The second reason, which is sometimes given, is that the security of our system of records requires that a purchaser on the faith of the records should be kept safe. But this second reason does not appear to me to add anything to the force of the first reason, and this is evident when we consider that an ex facie absolute holder of personal estate, such as shares or moveable bonds, may also give a good title to a purchaser, although in this case the element of registration in a public register is absent.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891.
Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

Passing to the case before us of a bankrupt trustee whose estate is to be divided amongst his creditors, I should imagine that the property available for distribution would be the property which the bankrupt holds in his own right, and that on proof that any estate vested in the bankrupt is trust-estate, it ought to be struck out of the sequestration. It is admitted that this is the law in relation to personal estate, and no reason has been given satisfactory to my mind why it should not be the law in relation to heritable estate which may be vested in the bankrupt in trust. The rule is expressed in our older decisions in the maxim that creditors and adjudgers take the debtor's estate tantum et tale as it stands in his person. In other words, they take the estate affected by all latent equities which were binding on the bankrupt himself. This rule is illustrated by the leading case of Thomson v. Douglas, Heron, & Co., M. 10,229. Thomson disponed his lands to a trustee in trust that he might sell the same and apply the proceeds "for the disponer's behoof." The disponee omitted the qualifying declaration from his title, and used the estate as a fund of credit for himself, borrowing money on heritable security, and afterwards became insolvent. The heritable creditors were held to have a good title against the truster, but the truster's right was held to be preferable as against adjudging creditors, and it was observed on the bench that "by decisions which for the stability of the law ought not to be departed from, they (the adjudging creditors) must take the right of their debtor tantum et tale as it was in his person."

It appears that some doubts have been expressed as to the soundness of this decision by Professor G. J. Bell in his Commentaries, 5th ed. pp. 282-3.

I have the greatest respect for the views of Professor Bell, but I do not hold him to be infallible. I will add that I am not satisfied that in the passage referred to Bell was contemplating the case of proper trust-estate, because the case he puts is that of a disponee who is "under a relative personal obligation," and the case he quotes, Wylie v. Duncan, is not a case of a trust qualifying the title of the trustee, but is the case of a bankrupt disponee who had purchased an estate out-and-out, at the same time coming under a collateral personal obligation to reconvey on demand. The case is correctly summarised by Professor Bell himself in a footnote, thus,—"Pactum de retrovendendo contained in a back-bond was held merely personal, and not effectual against creditors." From my point of view the decision in Wylie v. Duncan is unimpeachable. The bankrupt's title was essentially an individual title, and did not lose that character by reason of his having come under a separate and independent obligation (which might never be put in force) to reconvey on demand. But the estate of a trustee does not depend on the future action or resolution of the truster. It is essentially qualified, and it is as much the right of the trustee to require the truster to take back the estate and to repay him his advances, as it is the right of the truster to call for a reconveyance on tendering payment of the advances. If the Judges who decided Wylie v. Duncan meant to disaffirm the principle which was solemnly laid down in the case of Douglas, Heron, & Co., it is extraordinary that the report should contain no trace of such an intention. The two cases appear to me quite consistent, and the principle is this, that where the bankrupt's right is qualified, the creditors take subject to the qualification, but that creditors are not affected by separate personal obligations which do not qualify the estate, and are only intended to bind the disponee personally.

No. 218.
July 14, 1891.
Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

Since 1803, when the latter of these cases was decided, I cannot find that this question has been the subject of direct decision. But there are two decisions of the House of Lords in which it has been raised.

In Jeffrey v. Paul, 1 S. and M'L. 767, as I read it, the right of the truster was not in question at all. There were three trustees, who together had made advances exceeding the value of the estate, and the competition was between the trustees. Now, it is a known principle of trust law that every trustee has a lien over the trust-estate for his advances, and where trustees have advanced money in different proportions, there may be difficulty in explicating their rights over the insolvent estate. A decision on such a question would not, in my judgment, be an authority applicable to the present case. If Lord Brougham had supposed he was dealing with so large a question as the claim of the creditors of a bankrupt trustee to divide the trust-estate amongst them, it is inconceivable that the noble Lord would have decided the case without making a single observation regarding this point. But if the case involved nothing more than the settlement of rights arising out of the trustees' lien (which I take to be its real nature), it did not call for any discussion of matters of principle, and in this view the case has no bearing on the present dispute. I understand that some of your Lordships take the view that the facts in Jeffrey v. Paul raise this question, and that the judgment of the House of Lords can only be explained or supported by supposing that the House did not recognise the latent trust. If this view does not truly involve an assumption of the question (as I think it does), it is at least open to the observation that the precedent proposed to be established is not founded on any expression of judicial opinion to be found in the case. Now, as I see no reason to believe that Lord Brougham really entertained the opinion that is attributed to him, I cannot regard this case as an authority for the proposition for which it is cited.

The other case in the House of Lords is Fleeming v. Howden, Law. Rep. 1 Scotch Ap. p. 372. In that case Lord Westbury observed,—"The right of a trustee under a sequestration is very different from the right of a singular successor, for it is a rule common both to English and Scotch bankruptcy law that the trustee or assignee takes the property of the bankrupt subject to all the rights and equities that affected it at the time of the bankruptcy. But the singular successor is not bound by a trust or duty of which he had no notice. The trustee under a sequestration is in the same position as a gratuitous alienee. He takes such estate or interest only as the bankrupt can lawfully convey,"—p. 382. Similar observations, though less pointedly expressed, are to be found in the opinions of Lords Cranworth and Chelmsford. It was argued to the House of Lords that the vesting clauses of the Scottish Bankruptcy Act gave to the creditors of the bankrupt all the estate that was vested in him in title. The House rejected that construction, and held that the statute only gave the creditors what was vested in their debtor as of right; Lord Chelmsford observing on the words "estate capable of being affected by diligence or attached for debt," that these words "are nothing more than a general description of the species of property which the sequestration is to embrace." This leads me to observe that the present question is not, as I think, in any way touched by the vesting clause of the Bankruptcy Act. Suppose the trust purposes to be engrossed in the trustee's title, on his bankruptcy the vesting clause takes effect on the property. But then the estate acquired by the creditors in virtue of that clause is of no value to them, because it is a mere legal estate affected by a trust. The question here is, whether the right is not so qualified where the conditions of the trust are contained in a separate writing. Now, the Bankruptcy Act does not profess to solve this question, but leaves it to be determined according to known principles of law and equity. Exception has been taken to the expression used by Lord Westbury that the trustee under a sequestration is in the same position as a "gratuitous alienee." It may be that these words are not the best that could be chosen to express the quality of the right of creditors in the estate of their debtor. But there can be little doubt as to Lord Westbury's meaning. He meant to emphasise the distinction that creditors in a bankruptcy are not in the position of a purchaser who has advanced money on the faith of the seller's or mortgagor's title, but are only in the position of a disponee who takes his debtor's estate for whatever it is worth, in security or satisfaction of a pre-existing claim. Lord Westbury uses the words of the statute when he says that the trustee in a sequestration takes such interest as the bankrupt might "lawfully convey." His Lordship evidently understood these words as meaning that the trustee takes such estate as the bankrupt could honestly convey, not as meaning that the creditors would be in the position of a purchaser to whom the bankrupt had fraudulently conveyed. A fraudulent conveyance is not a "lawful" conveyance, although it may have the effect of vesting the property in a purchaser who has paid a full price and who was not cognisant of the fraud. Why creditors should be put in this position I am unable to understand.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

It has been pointed out that in the case of Fleeming v. Howden, although the entail was not perfected by being recorded in the Register of Entails, yet creditors might have discovered by examining the Register of Sasines, that the entail contained a clause of devolution, and that therefore the heir in possession after succeeding to the peerage held the estate as a quasi-trustee for the next heir in succession. It may be that this circumstance renders the case of Fleeming v. Howden a less direct authority than it would otherwise be for the doctrines which are there laid down. But this specialty was fully in view of the Lords who took part in the decision; and while they certainly refer in their judicial opinions to this specialty they nevertheless profess to lay down a general rule of bankruptcy law in the passages to which I have referred.

I may conclude by observing that I am unable to see how any practical inconvenience or injustice to anyone can result from the recognition in a question with creditors of the inherent qualification of the title of a trustee to trust-estate. Creditors in general do not give credit to a bankrupt in reliance on any supposed presumption that property standing in his name is his private property. Unless they are going to advance money on heritable security they know nothing of his title-deeds, and trust only to his personal credit. The security offered by our system of records is an excellent thing to those who desire to take advantage of it, and I should be the last person to wish to impair its efficiency. But it is not at all involved in the present case. No just expectations can be disappointed by withdrawing from a sequestration an estate to which the bankrupt never had anything more than an administrative title; and I should think less highly than I do of our system of property law if I believed that it compelled us to give to creditors a right which the bankrupt himself could not conscientiously give, and which he never professed to be able to convey.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891.
Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

LORD KINNEAR.—If this were an open question, I should have thought that a great deal of weight must be attached to certain considerations which have been stated by Lord M'Laren. But I take it to be settled law that a trustee for creditors under the Bankruptcy Acts takes the heritable estate in which the bankrupt was infeft subject to no limitations or burdens which do not appear on the face of the record, and therefore that his right is in no way affected by a latent trust such as that which is alleged in the present case. I think the question arises in a somewhat simpler form than in the earlier cases to which your Lordships have referred, because although the present Bankruptcy Act is in substance the same as the previous statutes for the same purpose, still the vesting clauses are not expressed in the same way as the corresponding clauses of the previous Acts; and I think that the vesting clauses of the present Act are so expressed as to leave very little room for difficulties that may have been found, in the construction of the previous statutes. The trustee's right appears to me to be measured by the heritable diligences, which are specified in the second subsection of section 104 of the Bankrupt Act of 1856. The heritable estate under that subsection is vested in the trustee to the same effect "as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt subject to no legal reversion had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration." Now, as I understand the argument, it has not been suggested that any question could be raised as to the effect of a duly recorded decree of adjudication in implement of a contract of sale. It is admitted to be well settled in law that no condition or obligation, not incorporated in the infeftment, can have any effect in a question with a purchaser in good faith from a feudal proprietor. A proprietor infeft as of fee by an absolute title is in a position to make a perfectly effectual contract for the sale of the estate, notwithstanding that his right may in fact be qualified by some latent trust or personal obligation. It is of no consequence whether the purchaser may have completed his title by a voluntary, or by a judicial conveyance, provided that he has taken infeftment before the true owner has taken the necessary steps for vindicating his right. But the statute gives to the trustee for creditors all the right which the common law gives to a bona fide purchaser. It appears to me to follow from the enactment which I have quoted that heritable property in which a bankrupt stands infeft by an absolute title, so that it could be made the subject of an effectual contract of sale, and adjudged by the purchaser in implement of such a contract, must necessarily be vested in the trustee by force of the statute to the same effect as it would be vested in the purchaser by force of his decree of adjudication.

But while it is very material to observe that the trustee is in the same position as if he had adjudged the bankrupt's heritable estate in implement of a contract of sale, I am disposed to think that the other heritable diligence which is specified in the second subsection would be equally effectual, because in bankruptcy an adjudger for debt stands in as good a position as an adjudger in implement. Mr Bell states the law thus—"As in bankruptcy there is no true distinction among creditors who hitherto held nothing but a mere personal oblig-

No. 218.

July 14, 1891.
Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

tion, whether that obligation be to pay money, or to convey land, or to perform any other specific act—a creditor for a money debt being just as well entitled to have direct execution against the debtor's land as one who holds an obligation from the debtor to convey land to him; so a creditor obtaining an adjudication in implement will not have preference over a creditor for debt who, with a decree of adjudication in payment, has previously completed his security by sasine." It is true that there was at one time some doubt whether a distinction, in this respect, ought not to be taken between purchasers and adjudgers for debt; and the case of Thomson v. Douglas, Heron, & Company has been cited as an authority in support of that distinction. It is said to have been decided, in this case, that an adjudging creditor will be affected by a latent trust which will not be effectual against a purchaser. The decision has been overruled, on the assumption that this is its import. But it does not appear to me that that case could very well be accepted as an authority upon the point, even if it had never been challenged. In the report of the case in the Folio Dictionary, it is stated that the point now in question was very little discussed, as the fund was said to be exhausted by preferable debts, and that the Court did not mean to lay down a general rule. I think the fuller report (M. 10,229) seems very much to bear out that statement in the Folio Dictionary. It appears that there were two specialties upon which it is quite possible that the case might have been decided without trenching in any degree upon the doctrine that neither adjudgers nor purchasers shall be affected by the latent obligations of a proprietor infeft. In the first place, the adjudging creditors had not taken infeftment, and therefore they had no real right in the land. In the second place, the latent trust which was held to be effectual against them, but ineffectual against disponees, had been omitted from the trustee's infeftment by fraud, but it was a trust for sale, so that the trustee's title to dispone could not have been successfully challenged if the trust had been expressed in the sasine. A disposition had been granted by a proprietor infeft to his man of business, "heritably and irredeemably, in order that he might sell the estate and apply the proceeds for behoof of the granter." The disponee executed the procuratory of resignation, and obtained a crown charter, but omitted to insert in the procuratory the above qualification of his right, so that it did not appear in the record. He thereafter disponed the estate in security of a loan, and certain of his creditors, to whom he had given no such security, adjudged the estate as being the property of their debtor. The original owner brought an action for the reduction of his trustee's infeftment, and all the rights derived from him; and his argument was that his trustee's assumption of the character of an unlimited proprietor, by the omission to engross the conditions of his right in the procuratory of resignation, was a fraud which must import labes realis, and invalidate the titles derived from him, as well as his own title. Now, that would have been a perfectly sound argument, if the Court had thought the conveyance in trust disabled the trustee from disponing in security of his own debt. It proceeds upon a distinction which is explained in the very learned and valuable dissertation on this subject which Baron Hume has appended to his report of the case of Calder v. Stewart. Baron Hume expounds very clearly the true ground of distinction between those cases in which purchasers or creditors of a proprietor infeft will be affected by latent defects or limitations of his right, and those cases in which they will not be so affected. He gives, as an illustration, the case of a proprietor

No. 218.

July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

infeft disponing his lands really in trust, but in terms absolute, and taking at the same time a back-bond from his disponee. In that case, he says a purchaser from the disponee cannot be affected by the personal obligations of his author, because the author is infeft as absolute fiar with the concurrence and by the act of the true owner, and his absolute right is therefore unqualified by any limitation which enters the record or affects the estate. But then, on the other hand, if the author's feudal investiture, although ex facie regular, is intrinsically vicious, as involving falsehood in its texture, or forgery, the title so acquired by fraud will be altogether ineffectual against the true owner. Now, in Thomson v. Douglas, Heron, & Company, the Court gave effect to that distinction, for what the Judges are reported to have said is this,—"If a disponee omit to engross in his infeftment those clauses which were meant by the disponer to limit or qualify his right, the disponer by this fraud can in no shape be hurt. The right will not be unlimited, because what was truly bestowed on the disponee was only a limited right. But in the present case the disposition imported absolute and unlimited property, although as a counterpart of this grant there arose a personal obligation on the disponee to render account, and whether this has been justly fulfilled or fraudulently violated, the right of property remains unaffected." The question therefore was considered on the assumption that the infeftment had been taken, as it ought to have been taken, in the same terms as the conveyance; and what was decided was merely this, that a disponee with a power of sale but under an obligation to account may infeft a lender as well as a purchaser, neither having any concern with the application of the price or of the loan. It was held that adjudging creditors were in a different position, and must take tantum et tale as the right stood in their debtor. But I apprehend that if that observation is to be referred to the particular facts of the case in which it is made, it means tantum et tale as the right would have stood in the debtor had his title been truly and honestly completed; and in that case, it might very well be held that the diligence of an ordinary creditor for an unsecured debt would not carry land that was held under a title, qualified as in the case supposed, although it might at the same time be held that conveyances to purchasers and lenders upon security of the estate were perfectly effectual. I am quite unable, therefore, if there were nothing else to be said, to accept the decision in the case of Douglas, Heron, & Company as a leading authority upon the point for which it has been cited. But it must be admitted that it has been referred to by subsequent writers, and in subsequent decisions, as a case that was intended to settle the general point. But if that be the import of the decision I think it clear that its authority has been very distinctly and decidedly rejected. Mr Bell says in a passage to which Lord Adam referred, that the decision was disapproved and departed from; and that appears to me to be a perfectly accurate statement. It appears to me that the case of Duncan v. Wylie, and the case of Douglas, Heron, & Company cannot stand together if the latter case means that land held by a title ex facie absolute, but subject to a latent and personal obligation to account as for a trust, cannot be adjudged by the creditors of the proprietor infeft. In Douglas, Heron, & Company, the true owner conveyed his estate to a trustee, to sell it for him and account to him for the proceeds. In Duncan v. Wylie, the owner remained in possession of the estate and granted a disposition in terms absolute, but really in security to a creditor, who was to pay himself, and was bound by the terms of an extrinsic agreement, to reconvey. Both of these were cases which involved not a direct but a constructive trust in the ostensible

owner of the estate, and therefore I cannot doubt that Mr Bell was right in saying, on the assumption to which I have referred, that they are inconsistent. If I am right in the view I have taken of Douglas, Heron, & Company, they are quite reconcilable. But in that view Douglas, Heron, & Company has no bearing upon the present question.

July 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

But Mr Bell does not stand alone. The doctrine laid down by him is stated with very great clearness and precision, in the dissertation of Baron Hume, to which I have already referred. He lays down the doctrine in the clearest possible terms and illustrates it, as I have observed, by the case of a conveyance ex facie absolute qualified by a back-bond of trust; and then he goes on to say that the position of a trustee for personal creditors infeft under a judicial sequestration of their debtor's estate, had been at one time thought to be different in this respect from that of purchasers obtaining a conveyance, but that it was now settled on the contrary that they stood exactly in the same situation, and as his authority for that statement he quotes Duncan v. Wylie, as a decision of which he clearly approves.

The whole question was made the subject of elaborate discussion in the very important case of Mansfield v. Inglis both here and in the House of Lords. There was a point in that case with which at present we have no concern—the question how far the Act of 1696, cap. 6, was applicable to the circumstances. But both here and in the House of Lords it was thought necessary to determine whether the effect of the Bankruptcy Statutes was to convey to a trustee for creditors heritable estate which the bankrupt himself could not convey to a lender or a purchaser without fraud; and in considering that question, the effect which our law allows to an unqualified infeftment was defined after full examination of the previous decisions. The conclusion at which the majority of the Court arrived, as expressed in the opinion of Lord Corehouse, was that a trustee in a sequestration, like a purchaser, takes the heritable estate free from all qualifications and limitations which do not appear on the record. Lord Corehouse observes, "It is said that although a bona fide purchaser is exposed to no objections but those which constitute a radical defect in the title of the seller, or in feudal property which appear on the face of the records, a creditor adjudging stands in a different situation and takes the right adjudged subject to the conditions and under the equities though latent, by which it was qualified in the person of the debtor, or in technical phraseology he takes it tantum et tale as his debtor had it. That this was at one time the doctrine of the law of Scotland, though not to the extent to which it is now maintained by the defender, may be granted. But the law has been settled otherwise by a numerous and consistent train of decisions, which are not now to be called in question." There can be no doubt that the case of Douglas, Heron, & Company was brought under consideration of the Court on this occasion, because it is mentioned in the opinion of the dissentient Judges as an authority against the conclusion at which the majority of the Court arrived. In the House of Lords Lord Brougham states the general rule of law quite as emphatically as Lord Corehouse states it in the Court below. He says (1 S. and M'L.'s Apps. 338), "Much of the argument in this case seems to have been rested on the analogy of our equitable estates in England, but the Scotch law holds no resemblance now with the law of England in this particular." And then his Lordship goes on to say,—"This consideration too is an answer to the argument that the trustee takes the estate of the bankrupt tantum et tale. He does so, and the estate was not affected in the bankrupt's hands by the personal obligations which were sufficiently valid and binding against the bankrupt. Between the bankrupt and the trustee there can be no privity such as to affect the latter with any personal obligation incurred by the former, and the land not being affected by such obligations the trustee taking it tantum et tale takes it discharged of any real burden." I think the case of Jeffrey v. Paul which was also decided by Lord Brougham within a very few weeks of the decision of Mansfield v. Inglis is an authority to the same effect; and I think with Lord Adam, for the reasons he has given, that it is a direct authority to the effect that the doctrine in question must apply to the case of a latent trust, just as clearly as to the case of any personal obligation arising from contract. I cannot see that we can draw any useful inference from the brevity of Lord Brougham's opinion as it is reported. It is evident from what is stated by the reporter that Lord Brougham did give his reasons for his judgment, although the reporter does not tell us what they were, because in the few words quoted his Lordship says he is now giving effect to the reasons he has stated previously. But, however that may be, the argument shews that the very point which had been rejected in Mansfield v. Inglis, that creditors take tantum et tale as their debtor held—was again urged upon the House in the case of Jeffrey v. Paul and again rejected. I think therefore that the latter case is directly in point; and apart from that decision, I must say I should have held the doctrine to be well established by authorities in our own books, which, as Lord Corehouse says, are not now to be called in question.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

It has been said—and Lord M'Laren is disposed to give effect to the argument—that there is a material distinction between the case of a personal obligation arising in any other way and a personal obligation arising from a trust reposed by the true owner of land in the ostensible owner. I confess I am unable to see any solid ground of distinction between these two cases. Every obligation which might have entered the record, but which the creditor in the obligation is content to leave standing upon the personal responsibility of the proprietor infeft, necessarily involves a trust in the latter; and accordingly Lord Westbury says, in the passage to which Lord Adam referred, that every obligation made in respect of land creates a trust. The true distinction is between those obligations which by their constitution are merely personal, and those, on the other hand, which have either been expressed in the title to land, or have only been omitted from the title by fraud, and in violation of the contract upon which they rest. It is well stated by Baron Hume. If the ground of challenge affects the honesty and validity of the title, so as to follow the land into whose hands soever it may come, then it may be effectual whether it enters the record or not; but if the ostensible owner is infeft as absolute fiar of the land without fraud or deceit, and under a title which the true owner has voluntarily conferred upon him, neither his disponees nor adjudgers on him will be affected by conditions or limitations which have not been made to affect the land itself. It is said that a trust operates as an inherent qualification of the title of the trustee. But an inherent qualification of the seller's right and title must affect the subject in the hands of a purchaser. An inherent trust which affects the title of a bankrupt, and yet which does not prevent him from making a conveyance contrary to the trust, is a contradiction in terms. Now, it is admitted that a bona fide purchaser would take the subjects in question free from all limitations or qualifications not expressed upon record, and it follows that these qualifications do not affect the legal right and title of the bankrupt whatever validity they may have as personal obligations upon the bankrupt himself.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891.

Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

The case of Fleeming v. Howden does not appear to me to present any real difficulty, for the reason stated by Lord Adam. All the learned Judges who took part in the decision based their judgment on the ground which Lord Adam has stated. Lord Westbury, indeed, uses some general expressions which might have a wider scope, but these expressions must be construed with reference to the case in which they were used, and if they should be read as having any wider effect than was necessary for the judgment in that case, then they would be inconsistent with the law previously laid down by the House of Lords in the case to which I have referred. But I think Lord Westbury makes it clear that it was not his intention to decide any other question except that which was before the House, because he refers to the words of the statute, by which it is provided that if any part of the bankruptcy estate be held under an entail or by a title otherwise limited, the right vested in the trustee shall be effectual only to the extent of the interest in the estate which the bankrupt might legally convey or the creditors attach. Now, according to that enactment the trustee's right depends upon the bankrupt's title, and his consequent capacity to make a legal and effectual conveyance on a sale; and in Howden's case the House of Lords held that the bankrupt could not have sold. But if that criterion be applied to the present case, the trustee must prevail, because nobody disputes that the bankrupt might have given a good legal conveyance to a purchaser. Of course it is not disputed that his doing so would have been a fraud, but I take it to be settled law that notwithstanding that he could not himself have conveyed to a purchaser or to an individual creditor without fraud, the statute will carry his estate to the general body of creditors, to be equally distributed amongst them all. I therefore concur in the conclusion at which Lord Adam has arrived.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in the judgment of Lord Adam and also in the views of Lord Kinnear, and I should hardly have thought it necessary to add anything to what has fallen from my two colleagues but for the importance of the case and the fact that there is a division of opinion on the bench, but in these circumstances I shall beg leave to add a few observations.

It appears to me that there is a principle in the law of Scotland which affirms that where a party has a legal title in writing, whether he be disponee or assignee, and that title has been perfected by sasine in the one case and intimation of the assignation in the other, the title is not defeasible by reference to any latent equities. I say that principle exists in the law of Scotland outside altogether of the statutory rules of bankruptcy, and there is no better illustration of this than in the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Somervail v. Redfearn, 1813, 1 Dow's Rep. 50. In that case a share in a joint stock company had formed the subject of an assignation which was duly intimated. The cedent had held the subjects originally as trustee for another party, but that did not appear upon the face of any title, and particularly did not appear on the face of the title which he gave to his assignee. In these circumstances the House of Lords held that the assignee having intimated his assignation could not be affected by any latent trust or latent equity. Lord Eldon, who, along with Lord Redesdale, gave the judgment in that case, puts the case thus (p. 72):—"There were cases of back-bonds upon assignments of back-bonds, but he had looked very anxiously and carefully to see whether there were any cases where latent equities had prevailed against intimated assignations, and he had found none. An assignation would even defeat an arrestment, if intimated before the arrestment, as the arrestment was only a prohibitory diligence. If latent equities were suffered to prevail against assignations, the effect would be that nothing could ever be assigned, for so long as their Scottish neighbours retained any part of their characteristic shrewdness, they would never take an assignment if they were aware that by means of latent defects such assignments might give them nothing." Now, it is very true that that question arose out of the bankruptcy of the cedent, but it occurred so far back as the year 1813, before any of the new statutes—if I may so call them—of bankruptcy were passed by the Legislature, and I think it proceeds from beginning to end not upon any reference or allusion to the bankrupt law then in existence, but entirely upon the general principle to which I have referred.

No. 218.

July 14, 1893. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

Now, if that be the general principle of the law of Scotland, it seems to me that a reference to the statutory rules of bankruptcy shews that that principle has been enforced and extended by these rules. I am not sure that people always attach an adequate value to the words of the vesting clause in the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, and I rather think they were not mentioned in the course of the argument, but I take leave to call attention to them for the purpose of seeing what is the nature and extent of the title that a trustee in a sequestration obtains by means of that clause. As regards the heritable estate of the bankrupt, he is said to be vested to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration. Now, that seems to me to be as comprehensive a title as any statute could possibly confer upon a trustee. He has an adjudication in implement of sale. That immediately constitutes an absolute title to the property. He has a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion. That is to say, he is in the same position as an adjudger upon an adjudication whose legal has expired. I can hardly conceive any stronger title to heritage than that is. So in like manner as regards the moveable estate of a bankrupt, although that is not in question in the present case, it is transferred, "so far as attachable for debt, to the same effect as if actual delivery or possession had been obtained or intimation made at that date, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration and are not null or reducible." Now, could anything more forcibly enact that the principle embodied in the case of Somervail v. Redfearn should have effect as regards the vesting of the moveable estate of the bankrupt in the trustee? It is to be vested in him "so far as attachable for debt," and all moveable estate is attachable for debt unless something in the title—something that is published and made known to the world—appears to prevent that moveable estate from being attached and from being brought within the operation of the sequestration. But with that single exception everything in the nature of moveable estate attaches absolutely to the trustee.

I think the reference to the vesting clause of the statute is very conclusive of the whole of this matter. But a great many cases have been referred to which I am not going to enumerate. They have been referred to by my brother Lord Kinnear so far as of importance in the present case, but I take leave to observe at the case of an adjudger is a totally different case from that which we have to deal with here. The cases which refer to adjudications for debt are cases dealing with adjudications in which the legal had not expired, and therefore they give no light at all. But in the present case we have a statute to guide us and to tell us that the adjudication in favour of the trustee in a sequestration is an adjudication which has no legal, or is the same as one in which the legal has expired, and so cases of adjudication where the legal has not expired, and where there is after all nothing but a decree of adjudication, which may form a good security upon the estate, do not help us.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

It seems to me that the case of Fleeming v. Howden has been somewhat misunderstood, not by my brethren who concur with me in this case, but elsewhere. The heir of entail in possession in that case, Mr John Howden, was infeft in the estate, and upon the face of his title it appeared quite clearly that he was not a fee-simple proprietor. No doubt, as the entail had not been recorded, there were certain infirmities in his title as proprietor, but there was nothing in the entail that made his right more extensive than it would otherwise have been, or more extensive than it appeared to be on the face of his recorded infeftment. Therefore that case appears to me to have no application here, unless it be that there is, in the opinion of Lord Westbury, a doctrine, which I must say I find for the first time in that noble and learned Lord's judgment, and which I have always had some difficulty in completely understanding. He says that "the right of a trustee in a sequestration is very different from the right of a singular successor, for it is a rule common to both English and Scotch bankruptcy law that the trustee or assignee takes the property of the bankrupt subject to all the rights and equities that affected it at the time of the bankruptcy." Now, I take upon me to question the soundness of that law so far as it regards the existing Bankruptcy Statute. The right of a trustee in a sequestration is not different from the right of a singular successor, because he is made a singular successor vi statuti. He is in the same position as if he had an adjudication in implement of sale, and an adjudication for debt with an expired legal, consequently the rights of property are vested in him just as completely as the right of any singular successor. His Lordship goes on to say that "the trustee in a sequestration is in the same position as a gratuitous alienee. He takes such estate or interest only as the bankrupt can lawfully convey. So in England the assignee takes such interest only as the bankrupt can lawfully depart withal. The force of the two expressions is the same, and the implied conveyance to the trustee or assignee ranks no higher than a gratuitous alienation." Now, what is meant in that passage of Lord Westbury's opinion by gratuitous alienations? If it means that the trustee gave nothing for the property, but has right to it by the operation of the Bankruptcy Act, then I assent to it, but it is irrelevant. But if, on the other hand, it is meant in a more substantial sense to express that there is no onerous consideration for the transference of the right of property from the bankrupt to the trustee, that admits, I think, of a very simple answer. The onerous consideration there is the vesting in the trustee of the estate for the purpose of paying the debts of the bankrupt. That I apprehend to be a most onerous consideration. The estate is given to him in trust no doubt, but it is in trust for a purpose, and for a purpose expressed, and the onerous consideration for a conveyance in trust is generally to be found in the trust purposes. The trust purposes here are that the debts of the creditors shall be paid and the bankrupt ultimately discharged. I cannot see how it is possible in any view to reconcile the dicta of Lord Westbury with the judgment pronounced by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford in the same case, and still less are his dicta reconcilable with the precise terms of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. I have thought it right to add these observations to what your Lordships have said—not that I think the views of your Lordships require any strengthening, but that I might pay due deference to the opinion of my brother on the left and to the importance of the case.

No. 218. July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

THE COURT found and declared that the second party, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of Daniel Smith M'Kay, took the subjects free of the latent trust in favour of the first parties, and that the first parties were entitled only to rank on the sequestrated estate for the value of said subjects, and were not entitled to recover the same from the second party as their own property: Further, found and declared that the surplus price of said subjects belonged to the second party as trustee foresaid, and decerned.

WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 219. July 15, 1891. Baird v. Baird.

GEORGE ALEXANDER BAIRD, Petitioner (Respondent).—D.-F. Balfour—W. L. Mackenzie.

JOHN GEORGE ALEXANDER BAIRD AND OTHERS, Respondents (Reclaimers).—Dickson—Ure.

Entail—Disentail—Entail Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 13.—The Entail Act, 1882, sec. 13, enacts,—"In any application under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent, or other nearest heir, is required, and such heir, or the curator ad litem appointed to him in terms of this Act, shall refuse or fail to give his consent, the Court shall ascertain the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate of such heir with reference to such application, and shall direct the sum so ascertained to be paid into bank in name of the said heir, or that proper security shall be given over the estate, and shall thereafter dispense with the consent of the said heir, and shall proceed as if such consent had been obtained." Held that the conditions upon which the Court is authorised to dispense with the consent of an heir are imperative, and must be strictly complied with.

In a petition for disentail, which was opposed by the next three heirs, the Lord Ordinary—before the value of the interests of the three next heirs had been ascertained, but after the respondents had stated their claim at £50,000—pronounced an interlocutor, in which he found that the value of the interests of the three next heirs did not exceed the value of £55,000, and, upon the petitioner consigning that sum in the joint names of the agents of the petitioner and the respondents subject to the future orders of the Court, dispensed with the consents of the said heirs, and interponed his authority to the disentail. Held that the interlocutor was incompetent.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low. C.

IN July 1889 George Alexander Baird presented a petition for authority to disentail the lands of Strichen and others, of which he was institute of entail, with the consent of the three next heirs, and as they declined to give their consent the Lord Ordinary made a remit to ascertain the value of their expectancy in terms of the Entail Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 13.*

It appeared from the report of the actuary to whom the remit was made, and from the objections to that report, that a considerable delay would probably take place before the expectancies were valued, and accordingly the petitioner offered "to consign in bank, subject to the order of the Court,

* Quoted in rubric.

No. 219.

July 15, 1891.
Baird v. Baird.

the largest sum claimed by the respondents, viz., £50,000, or such other sum as may appear to the Court satisfactory to fully secure the value in money of the next heirs' expectancies, and thus to admit of the Court dispensing with the consents of the respondents, and granting the prayer of the petition in so far as to approve of the instrument of disentail (No. 23 of process), and interpone authority thereto; and to grant warrant upon such consignation being made for recording said instrument in the Register of Entails."

On 18th June 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the value in money of the interests or expectancies of the respondents John George Alexander Baird, James Douglas Baird, and Henry Robert Baird, the three next heirs of entail in the entailed estates mentioned in the petition, do not exceed the sum of £55,000 sterling in all; and, in respect of the offer made by the petitioner in the said minute, No. 36 of process, and upon the petitioner consigning in bank, in the joint names of the agents of the petitioner and the respondents, the three next heirs of entail, and subject to the future orders of the Court, the sum of £55,000 sterling, to meet the value of the said interests or expectancies of the said respondents in the said entailed estates, dispenses with the consents of the said respondents as next heirs of entail foresaid to the disentail of the said estates: Finds that the procedure has been regular and proper, and in conformity with the provisions of the Acts of Parliament and relative Acts of Sederunt: Interpones authority to and approves of the instrument of disentail, No. 23 of process: Grants warrant to, and authorises and ordains the Keeper of the Register of Tailzies to record the same in said register, in terms of the statute, and decerns ad interim: But supersedes extract and execution hereof until the said consignation has been made, and the receipt therefor lodged in process and transmitted to the Accountant of Court."

The respondents (the three next heirs) reclaimed.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in the course he has adopted in this case. I think that he has failed to give sufficient weight to the very precise provisions of the 13th section of the Act of 1882. When a power of disentail is given by statute, which is coupled with attendant conditions, it is an imperative rule that these conditions must be simply and literally complied with by anyone who seeks to take advantage of the power. Now, nothing can be clearer than the conditions of this section. It is in these terms:—"In any application under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent, or other nearest heir, is required, and such heir, or the curator ad litem appointed to him in terms of this Act, shall refuse or fail to give his consent, the Court shall ascertain"—these words are perfectly clear and imperative—"the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate of such heir with reference to such application, and shall direct the sum so ascertained to be paid into bank in name of the said heir, or that proper security shall be given over the estate, and shall thereafter dispense with the consent of the said heir, and shall proceed as if such consent had been obtained." It follows as a matter of course that until the value in money of the expectancy of the next heir has been ascertained and paid into bank or secured there can be no authority to disentail. On that simple ground—I do not think I can elaborate it,—I am for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitting to his Lordship to proceed.

[1] Shand v. Home, March 4, 1876, 3 R. 544; M'Donalds v. M'Donald, March 12, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 41.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891.

Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

that it compelled us to give to creditors a right which the bankrupt himself could not conscientiously give, and which he never professed to be able to convey.

LORD KINNEAR.—If this were an open question, I should have thought that a great deal of weight must be attached to certain considerations which have been stated by Lord M'Laren. But I take it to be settled law that a trustee for creditors under the Bankruptcy Acts takes the heritable estate in which the bankrupt was infeft subject to no limitations or burdens which do not appear on the face of the record, and therefore that his right is in no way affected by a latent trust such as that which is alleged in the present case. I think the question arises in a somewhat simpler form than in the earlier cases to which your Lordships have referred, because although the present Bankruptcy Act is in substance the same as the previous statutes for the same purpose, still the vesting clauses are not expressed in the same way as the corresponding clauses of the previous Acts; and I think that the vesting clauses of the present Act are so expressed as to leave very little room for difficulties that may have been found, in the construction of the previous statutes. The trustee's right appears to me to be measured by the heritable diligences, which are specified in the second subsection of section 104 of the Bankrupt Act of 1856. The heritable estate under that subsection is vested in the trustee to the same effect "as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt subject to no legal reversion had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration." Now, as I understand the argument, it has not been suggested that any question could be raised as to the effect of a duly recorded decree of adjudication in implement of a contract of sale. It is admitted to be well settled in law that no condition or obligation, not incorporated in the infeftment, can have any effect in a question with a purchaser in good faith from a feudal proprietor. A proprietor infeft as of fee by an absolute title is in a position to make a perfectly effectual contract for the sale of the estate, notwithstanding that his right may in fact be qualified by some latent trust or personal obligation. It is of no consequence whether the purchaser may have completed his title by a voluntary, or by a judicial conveyance, provided that he has taken infeftment before the true owner has taken the necessary steps for vindicating his right. But the statute gives to the trustee for creditors all the right which the common law gives to a bona fide purchaser. It appears to me to follow from the enactment which I have quoted that heritable property in which a bankrupt stands infeft by an absolute title, so that it could be made the subject of an effectual contract of sale, and adjudged by the purchaser in implement of such a contract, must necessarily be vested in the trustee by force of the statute to the same effect as it would be vested in the purchaser by force of his decree of adjudication.

But while it is very material to observe that the trustee is in the same position as if he had adjudged the bankrupt's heritable estate in implement of a contract of sale, I am disposed to think that the other heritable diligence which is specified in the second subsection would be equally effectual, because in bankruptcy an adjudger for debt stands in as good a position as an adjudger in implement. Mr Bell states the law thus—"As in bankruptcy there is no true distinction among creditors who hitherto held nothing but a mere personal oblig-

No. 218.

July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

tion, whether that obligation be to pay money, or to convey land, or to perform any other specific act—a creditor for a money debt being just as well entitled to have direct execution against the debtor's land as one who holds an obligation from the debtor to convey land to him; so a creditor obtaining an adjudication in implement will not have preference over a creditor for debt who, with a decree of adjudication in payment, has previously completed his security by sasine." It is true that there was at one time some doubt whether a distinction, in this respect, ought not to be taken between purchasers and adjudgers for debt; and the case of Thomson v. Douglas, Heron, & Company has been cited as an authority in support of that distinction. It is said to have been decided, in this case, that an adjudging creditor will be affected by a latent trust which will not be effectual against a purchaser. The decision has been overruled, on the assumption that this is its import. But it does not appear to me that that case could very well be accepted as an authority upon the point, even if it had never been challenged. In the report of the case in the Folio Dictionary, it is stated that the point now in question was very little discussed, as the fund was said to be exhausted by preferable debts, and that the Court did not mean to lay down a general rule. I think the fuller report (M. 10,229) seems very much to bear out that statement in the Folio Dictionary. It appears that there were two specialties upon which it is quite possible that the case might have been decided without trenching in any degree upon the doctrine that neither adjudgers nor purchasers shall be affected by the latent obligations of a proprietor infeft. In the first place, the adjudging creditors had not taken infeftment, and therefore they had no real right in the land. In the second place, the latent trust which was held to be effectual against them, but ineffectual against disponees, had been omitted from the trustee's infeftment by fraud, but it was a trust for sale, so that the trustee's title to dispone could not have been successfully challenged if the trust had been expressed in the sasine. A disposition had been granted by a proprietor infeft to his man of business, "heritably and irredeemably, in order that he might sell the estate and apply the proceeds for behoof of the granter." The disponee executed the procuratory of resignation, and obtained a crown charter, but omitted to insert in the procuratory the above qualification of his right, so that it did not appear in the record. He thereafter disponed the estate in security of a loan, and certain of his creditors, to whom he had given no such security, adjudged the estate as being the property of their debtor. The original owner brought an action for the reduction of his trustee's infeftment, and all the rights derived from him; and his argument was that his trustee's assumption of the character of an unlimited proprietor, by the omission to engross the conditions of his right in the procuratory of resignation, was a fraud which must import labes realis, and invalidate the titles derived from him, as well as his own title. Now, that would have been a perfectly sound argument, if the Court had thought the conveyance in trust disabled the trustee from disponing in security of his own debt. It proceeds upon a distinction which is explained in the very learned and valuable dissertation on this subject which Baron Hume has appended to his report of the case of Calder v. Stewart. Baron Hume expounds very clearly the true ground of distinction between those cases in which purchasers or creditors of a proprietor infeft will be affected by latent defects or limitations of his right, and those cases in which they will not be so affected. He gives, as an illustration, the case of a proprietor

No. 218.

July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

infeft disponing his lands really in trust, but in terms absolute, and taking at the same time a back-bond from his disponee. In that case, he says a purchaser from the disponee cannot be affected by the personal obligations of his author, because the author is infeft as absolute fiar with the concurrence and by the act of the true owner, and his absolute right is therefore unqualified by any limitation which enters the record or affects the estate. But then, on the other hand, if the author's feudal investiture, although ex facie regular, is intrinsically vicious, as involving falsehood in its texture, or forgery, the title so acquired by fraud will be altogether ineffectual against the true owner. Now, in Thomson v. Douglas, Heron, & Company, the Court gave effect to that distinction, for what the Judges are reported to have said is this,—"If a disponee omit to engross in his infeftment those clauses which were meant by the disponer to limit or qualify his right, the disponer by this fraud can in no shape be hurt. The right will not be unlimited, because what was truly bestowed on the disponee was only a limited right. But in the present case the disposition imported absolute and unlimited property, although as a counterpart of this grant there arose a personal obligation on the disponee to render account, and whether this has been justly fulfilled or fraudulently violated, the right of property remains unaffected." The question therefore was considered on the assumption that the infeftment had been taken, as it ought to have been taken, in the same terms as the conveyance; and what was decided was merely this, that a disponee with a power of sale but under an obligation to account may infeft a lender as well as a purchaser, neither having any concern with the application of the price or of the loan. It was held that adjudging creditors were in a different position, and must take tantum et tale as the right stood in their debtor. But I apprehend that if that observation is to be referred to the particular facts of the case in which it is made, it means tantum et tale as the right would have stood in the debtor had his title been truly and honestly completed; and in that case, it might very well be held that the diligence of an ordinary creditor for an unsecured debt would not carry land that was held under a title, qualified as in the case supposed, although it might at the same time be held that conveyances to purchasers and lenders upon security of the estate were perfectly effectual. I am quite unable, therefore, if there were nothing else to be said, to accept the decision in the case of Douglas, Heron, & Company as a leading authority upon the point for which it has been cited. But it must be admitted that it has been referred to by subsequent writers, and in subsequent decisions, as a case that was intended to settle the general point. But if that be the import of the decision I think it clear that its authority has been very distinctly and decidedly rejected. Mr Bell says in a passage to which Lord Adam referred, that the decision was disapproved and departed from; and that appears to me to be a perfectly accurate statement. It appears to me that the case of Duncan v. Wylie, and the case of Douglas, Heron, & Company cannot stand together if the latter case means that land held by a title ex facie absolute, but subject to a latent and personal obligation to account as for a trust, cannot be adjudged by the creditors of the proprietor infeft. In Douglas, Heron, & Company, the true owner conveyed his estate to a trustee, to sell it for him and account to him for the proceeds. In Duncan v. Wylie, the owner remained in possession of the estate and granted a disposition in terms absolute, but really in security to a creditor, who was to pay himself, and was bound by the terms of an extrinsic agreement, to reconvey. Both of these were cases which involved not a direct but a constructive trust in the ostensible

owner of the estate, and therefore I cannot doubt that Mr Bell was right in saying, on the assumption to which I have referred, that they are inconsistent. If I am right in the view I have taken of Douglas, Heron, & Company, they are quite reconcilable. But in that view Douglas, Heron, & Company has no bearing upon the present question.

July 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

But Mr Bell does not stand alone. The doctrine laid down by him is stated with very great clearness and precision, in the dissertation of Baron Hume, to which I have already referred. He lays down the doctrine in the clearest possible terms and illustrates it, as I have observed, by the case of a conveyance ex facie absolute qualified by a back-bond of trust; and then he goes on to say that the position of a trustee for personal creditors infeft under a judicial sequestration of their debtor's estate, had been at one time thought to be different in this respect from that of purchasers obtaining a conveyance, but that it was now settled on the contrary that they stood exactly in the same situation, and as his authority for that statement he quotes Duncan v. Wylie, as a decision of which he clearly approves.

The whole question was made the subject of elaborate discussion in the very important case of Mansfield v. Inglis both here and in the House of Lords. There was a point in that case with which at present we have no concern—the question how far the Act of 1696, cap. 6, was applicable to the circumstances. But both here and in the House of Lords it was thought necessary to determine whether the effect of the Bankruptcy Statutes was to convey to a trustee for creditors heritable estate which the bankrupt himself could not convey to a lender or a purchaser without fraud; and in considering that question, the effect which our law allows to an unqualified infeftment was defined after full examination of the previous decisions. The conclusion at which the majority of the Court arrived, as expressed in the opinion of Lord Corehouse, was that a trustee in a sequestration, like a purchaser, takes the heritable estate free from all qualifications and limitations which do not appear on the record. Lord Corehouse observes, "It is said that although a bona fide purchaser is exposed to no objections but those which constitute a radical defect in the title of the seller, or in feudal property which appear on the face of the records, a creditor adjudging stands in a different situation and takes the right adjudged subject to the conditions and under the equities though latent, by which it was qualified in the person of the debtor, or in technical phraseology he takes it tantum et tale as his debtor had it. That this was at one time the doctrine of the law of Scotland, though not to the extent to which it is now maintained by the defender, may be granted. But the law has been settled otherwise by a numerous and consistent train of decisions, which are not now to be called in question." There can be no doubt that the case of Douglas, Heron, & Company was brought under consideration of the Court on this occasion, because it is mentioned in the opinion of the dissentient Judges as an authority against the conclusion at which the majority of the Court arrived. In the House of Lords Lord Brougham states the general rule of law quite as emphatically as Lord Corehouse states it in the Court below. He says (1 S. and M'L.'s Apps. 338), "Much of the argument in this case seems to have been rested on the analogy of our equitable estates in England, but the Scotch law holds no resemblance now with the law of England in this particular." And then his Lordship goes on to say,—"This consideration too is an answer to the argument that the trustee takes the estate of the bankrupt tantum et tale. He does so, and the estate was not affected in the bankrupt's hands by the personal obligations which were sufficiently valid and binding against the bankrupt. Between the bankrupt and the trustee there can be no privity such as to affect the latter with any personal obligation incurred by the former, and the land not being affected by such obligations the trustee taking it tantum et tale takes it discharged of any real burden." I think the case of Jeffrey v. Paul which was also decided by Lord Brougham within a very few weeks of the decision of Mansfield v. Inglis is an authority to the same effect; and I think with Lord Adam, for the reasons he has given, that it is a direct authority to the effect that the doctrine in question must apply to the case of a latent trust, just as clearly as to the case of any personal obligation arising from contract. I cannot see that we can draw any useful inference from the brevity of Lord Brougham's opinion as it is reported. It is evident from what is stated by the reporter that Lord Brougham did give his reasons for his judgment, although the reporter does not tell us what they were, because in the few words quoted his Lordship says he is now giving effect to the reasons he has stated previously. But, however that may be, the argument shews that the very point which had been rejected in Mansfield v. Inglis, that creditors take tantum et tale as their debtor held—was again urged upon the House in the case of Jeffrey v. Paul and again rejected. I think therefore that the latter case is directly in point; and apart from that decision, I must say I should have held the doctrine to be well established by authorities in our own books, which, as Lord Corehouse says, are not now to be called in question.

No. 218.

July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

It has been said—and Lord M'Laren is disposed to give effect to the argument—that there is a material distinction between the case of a personal obligation arising in any other way and a personal obligation arising from a trust reposed by the true owner of land in the ostensible owner. I confess I am unable to see any solid ground of distinction between these two cases. Every obligation which might have entered the record, but which the creditor in the obligation is content to leave standing upon the personal responsibility of the proprietor infeft, necessarily involves a trust in the latter; and accordingly Lord Westbury says, in the passage to which Lord Adam referred, that every obligation made in respect of land creates a trust. The true distinction is between those obligations which by their constitution are merely personal, and those, on the other hand, which have either been expressed in the title to land, or have only been omitted from the title by fraud, and in violation of the contract upon which they rest. It is well stated by Baron Hume. If the ground of challenge affects the honesty and validity of the title, so as to follow the land into whose hands soever it may come, then it may be effectual whether it enters the record or not; but if the ostensible owner is infeft as absolute fiar of the land without fraud or deceit, and under a title which the true owner has voluntarily conferred upon him, neither his disponees nor adjudgers on him will be affected by conditions or limitations which have not been made to affect the land itself. It is said that a trust operates as an inherent qualification of the title of the trustee. But an inherent qualification of the seller's right and title must affect the subject in the hands of a purchaser. An inherent trust which affects the title of a bankrupt, and yet which does not prevent him from making a conveyance contrary to the trust, is a contradiction in terms. Now, it is admitted that a bona fide purchaser would take the subjects in question free from all limitations or qualifications not expressed upon record, and it follows that these qualifications do not affect the legal right and title of the bankrupt whatever validity they may have as personal obligations upon the bankrupt himself.

The case of Fleeming v. Howden does not appear to me to present any real difficulty, for the reason stated by Lord Adam. All the learned Judges who took part in the decision based their judgment on the ground which Lord Adam has stated. Lord Westbury, indeed, uses some general expressions which might have a wider scope, but these expressions must be construed with reference to the case in which they were used, and if they should be read as having any wider effect than was necessary for the judgment in that case, then they would be inconsistent with the law previously laid down by the House of Lords in the case to which I have referred. But I think Lord Westbury makes it clear that it was not his intention to decide any other question except that which was before the House, because he refers to the words of the statute, by which it is provided that if any part of the bankruptcy estate be held under an entail or by a title otherwise limited, the right vested in the trustee shall be effectual only to the extent of the interest in the estate which the bankrupt might legally convey or the creditors attach. Now, according to that enactment the trustee's right depends upon the bankrupt's title, and his consequent capacity to make a legal and effectual conveyance on a sale; and in Howden's case the House of Lords held that the bankrupt could not have sold. But if that criterion be applied to the present case, the trustee must prevail, because nobody disputes that the bankrupt might have given a good legal conveyance to a purchaser. Of course it is not disputed that his doing so would have been a fraud, but I take it to be settled law that notwithstanding that he could not himself have conveyed to a purchaser or to an individual creditor without fraud, the statute will carry his estate to the general body of creditors, to be equally distributed amongst them all. I therefore concur in the conclusion at which Lord Adam has arrived.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in the judgment of Lord Adam and also in the views of Lord Kinnear, and I should hardly have thought it necessary to add anything to what has fallen from my two colleagues but for the importance of the case and the fact that there is a division of opinion on the bench, but in these circumstances I shall beg leave to add a few observations.

It appears to me that there is a principle in the law of Scotland which affirms that where a party has a legal title in writing, whether he be disponee or assignee, and that title has been perfected by sasine in the one case and intimation of the assignation in the other, the title is not defeasible by reference to any latent equities. I say that principle exists in the law of Scotland outside altogether of the statutory rules of bankruptcy, and there is no better illustration of this than in the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Somervail v. Redfearn, 1813, 1 Dow's Rep. 50. In that case a share in a joint stock company had formed the subject of an assignation which was duly intimated. The cedent had held the subjects originally as trustee for another party, but that did not appear upon the face of any title, and particularly did not appear on the face of the title which he gave to his assignee. In these circumstances the House of Lords held that the assignee having intimated his assignation could not be affected by any latent trust or latent equity. Lord Eldon, who, along with Lord Redesdale, gave the judgment in that case, puts the case thus (p. 72):—"There were cases of back-bonds upon assignments of back-bonds, but he had looked very anxiously and carefully to see whether there were any cases where latent equities had prevailed against intimated assignations, and he had found none. An assignation would even defeat an arrestment, if intimated before the arrestment, as the arrestment was only a prohibitory diligence. If latent equities were suffered to prevail against assignations, the effect would be that nothing could ever be assigned, for so long as their Scottish neighbours retained any part of their characteristic shrewdness, they would never take an assignment if they were aware that by means of latent defects such assignments might give them nothing." Now, it is very true that that question arose out of the bankruptcy of the cedent, but it occurred so far back as the year 1813, before any of the new statutes—if I may so call them—of bankruptcy were passed by the Legislature, and I think it proceeds from beginning to end not upon any reference or allusion to the bankrupt law then in existence, but entirely upon the general principle to which I have referred.

No. 218.

July 14, 1893. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kaig's Trustee.

Now, if that be the general principle of the law of Scotland, it seems to me that a reference to the statutory rules of bankruptcy shews that that principle has been enforced and extended by these rules. I am not sure that people always attach an adequate value to the words of the vesting clause in the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, and I rather think they were not mentioned in the course of the argument, but I take leave to call attention to them for the purpose of seeing what is the nature and extent of the title that a trustee in a sequestration obtains by means of that clause. As regards the heritable estate of the bankrupt, he is said to be vested to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration. Now, that seems to me to be as comprehensive a title as any statute could possibly confer upon a trustee. He has an adjudication in implement of sale. That immediately constitutes an absolute title to the property. He has a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion. That is to say, he is in the same position as an adjudger upon an adjudication whose legal has expired. I can hardly conceive any stronger title to heritage than that is. So in like manner as regards the moveable estate of a bankrupt, although that is not in question in the present case, it is transferred, "so far as attachable for debt, to the same effect as if actual delivery or possession had been obtained or intimation made at that date, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration and are not null or reducible." Now, could anything more forcibly enact that the principle embodied in the case of Somervail v. Redfearn should have effect as regards the vesting of the moveable estate of the bankrupt in the trustee? It is to be vested in him "so far as attachable for debt," and all moveable estate is attachable for debt unless something in the title—something that is published and made known to the world—appears to prevent that moveable estate from being attached and from being brought within the operation of the sequestration. But with that single exception everything in the nature of moveable estate attaches absolutely to the trustee.

I think the reference to the vesting clause of the statute is very conclusive of the whole of this matter. But a great many cases have been referred to which I am not going to enumerate. They have been referred to by my brother Lord Kinnear so far as of importance in the present case, but I take leave to observe that the case of an adjudger is a totally different case from that which we have to deal with here. The cases which refer to adjudications for debt are cases dealing with adjudications in which the legal had not expired, and therefore they give no light at all. But in the present case we have a statute to guide us and to tell us that the adjudication in favour of the trustee in a sequestration is an adjudication which has no legal, or is the same as one in which the legal has expired, and so cases of adjudication where the legal has not expired, and where there is after all nothing but a decree of adjudication, which may form a good security upon the estate, do not help us.

It seems to me that the case of Fleeming v. Howden has been somewhat misunderstood, not by my brethren who concur with me in this case, but elsewhere. The heir of entail in possession in that case, Mr John Howden, was infeft in the estate, and upon the face of his title it appeared quite clearly that he was not a fee-simple proprietor. No doubt, as the entail had not been recorded, there were certain infirmities in his title as proprietor, but there was nothing in the entail that made his right more extensive than it would otherwise have been, or more extensive than it appeared to be on the face of his recorded infeftment. Therefore that case appears to me to have no application here, unless it be that there is, in the opinion of Lord Westbury, a doctrine, which I must say I find for the first time in that noble and learned Lord's judgment, and which I have always had some difficulty in completely understanding. He says that "the right of a trustee in a sequestration is very different from the right of a singular successor, for it is a rule common to both English and Scotch bankruptcy law that the trustee or assignee takes the property of the bankrupt subject to all the rights and equities that affected it at the time of the bankruptcy." Now, I take upon me to question the soundness of that law so far as it regards the existing Bankruptcy Statute. The right of a trustee in a sequestration is not different from the right of a singular successor, because he is made a singular successor vi statuti. He is in the same position as if he had an adjudication in implement of sale, and an adjudication for debt with an expired legal, consequently the rights of property are vested in him just as completely as the right of any singular successor. His Lordship goes on to say that "the trustee in a sequestration is in the same position as a gratuitous alienee. He takes such estate or interest only as the bankrupt can lawfully convey. So in England the assignee takes such interest only as the bankrupt can lawfully depart withal. The force of the two expressions is the same, and the implied conveyance to the trustee or assignee ranks no higher than a gratuitous alienation." Now, what is meant in that passage of Lord Westbury's opinion by gratuitous alienations? If it means that the trustee gave nothing for the property, but has right to it by the operation of the Bankruptcy Act, then I assent to it, but it is irrelevant. But if, on the other hand, it is meant in a more substantial sense to express that there is no onerous consideration for the transference of the right of property from the bankrupt to the trustee, that admits, I think, of a very simple answer. The onerous consideration there is the vesting in the trustee of the estate for the purpose of paying the debts of the bankrupt. That I apprehend to be a most onerous consideration. The estate is given to him in trust no doubt, but it is a trust for a purpose, and for a purpose expressed, and the onerous consideration of a conveyance in trust is generally to be found in the trust purposes. The trust purposes here are that the debts of the creditors shall be paid and the bankrupt ultimately discharged. I cannot see how it is possible in any view to reconcile the dicta of Lord Westbury with the judgment pronounced by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford in the same case, and still less are his dicta reconcilable with the precise terms of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. I have thought it right to add these observations to what your Lordships have said—not that I think the views of your Lordships require any strengthening, but that I might pay due deference to the opinion of my brother on the left and to the importance of the case.

No. 218. July 14, 1891. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee.

THE COURT found and declared that the second party, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of Daniel Smith M'Kay, took the subjects free of the latent trust in favour of the first parties, and that the first parties were entitled only to rank on the sequestrated estate for the value of said subjects, and were not entitled to recover the same from the second party as their own property: Further, found and declared that the surplus price of said subjects belonged to the second party as trustee foresaid, and decerned.

WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 219. July 15, 1891. Baird v. Baird.

GEORGE ALEXANDER BAIRD, Petitioner (Respondent).—D.-F. Balfour—W. L. Mackenzie.

JOHN GEORGE ALEXANDER BAIRD AND OTHERS, Respondents (Reclaimers).—Dickson—Ure.

Entail—Disentail—Entail Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 13.—The Entail Act, 1882, sec. 13, enacts,—"In any application under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent, or other nearest heir, is required, and such heir, or the curator ad litem appointed to him in terms of this Act, shall refuse or fail to give his consent, the Court shall ascertain the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate of such heir with reference to such application, and shall direct the sum so ascertained to be paid into bank in name of the said heir, or that proper security shall be given over the estate, and shall thereafter dispense with the consent of the said heir, and shall proceed as if such consent had been obtained." Held that the conditions upon which the Court is authorised to dispense with the consent of an heir are imperative, and must be strictly complied with.

In a petition for disentail, which was opposed by the next three heirs, the Lord Ordinary—before the value of the interests of the three next heirs had been ascertained, but after the respondents had stated their claim at £50,000—pronounced an interlocutor, in which he found that the value of the interests of the three next heirs did not exceed the value of £55,000, and, upon the petitioner consigning that sum in the joint names of the agents of the petitioner and the respondents subject to the future orders of the Court, dispensed with the consents of the said heirs, and interponed his authority to the disentail. Held that the interlocutor was incompetent.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low. C.

IN July 1889 George Alexander Baird presented a petition for authority to disentail the lands of Strichen and others, of which he was institute of entail, with the consent of the three next heirs, and as they declined to give their consent the Lord Ordinary made a remit to ascertain the value of their expectancy in terms of the Entail Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 13.*

It appeared from the report of the actuary to whom the remit was made, and from the objections to that report, that a considerable delay would probably take place before the expectancies were valued, and accordingly the petitioner offered "to consign in bank, subject to the order of the Court,

* Quoted in rubric.

No. 219.
July 15, 1891.
Baird v. Baird.

the largest sum claimed by the respondents, viz., £50,000, or such other sum as may appear to the Court satisfactory to fully secure the value in money of the next heirs' expectancies, and thus to admit of the Court dispensing with the consents of the respondents, and granting the prayer of the petition in so far as to approve of the instrument of disentail (No. 23 of process), and interpone authority thereto; and to grant warrant upon such consignation being made for recording said instrument in the Register of Entails."

On 18th June 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the value in money of the interests or expectancies of the respondents John George Alexander Baird, James Douglas Baird, and Henry Robert Baird, the three next heirs of entail in the entailed estates mentioned in the petition, do not exceed the sum of £55,000 sterling in all; and, in respect of the offer made by the petitioner in the said minute, No. 36 of process, and upon the petitioner consigning in bank, in the joint names of the agents of the petitioner and the respondents, the three next heirs of entail, and subject to the future orders of the Court, the sum of £55,000 sterling, to meet the value of the said interests or expectancies of the said respondents in the said entailed estates, dispenses with the consents of the said respondents as next heirs of entail foresaid to the disentail of the said estates: Finds that the procedure has been regular and proper, and in conformity with the provisions of the Acts of Parliament and relative Acts of Sederunt: Interpones authority to and approves of the instrument of disentail, No. 23 of process: Grants warrant to, and authorises and ordains the Keeper of the Register of Tailzies to record the same in said register, in terms of the statute, and decerns ad interim: But supersedes extract and execution hereof until the said consignation has been made, and the receipt therefor lodged in process and transmitted to the Accountant of Court."

The respondents (the three next heirs) reclaimed.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in the course he has adopted in this case. I think that he has failed to give sufficient weight to the very precise provisions of the 13th section of the Act of 1882. When a power of disentail is given by statute, which is coupled with attendant conditions, it is an imperative rule that these conditions must be simply and literally complied with by anyone who seeks to take advantage of the power. Now, nothing can be clearer than the conditions of this section. It is in these terms:—"In any application under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent, or other nearest heir, is required, and such heir, or the curator ad litem appointed to him in terms of this Act, shall refuse or fail to give his consent, the Court shall ascertain"—these words are perfectly clear and imperative—"the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate of such heir with reference to such application, and shall direct the sum so ascertained to be paid into bank in name of the said heir, or that proper security shall be given over the estate, and shall thereafter dispense with the consent of the said heir, and shall proceed as if such consent had been obtained." It follows as a matter of course that until the value in money of the expectancy of the next heir has been ascertained and paid into bank or secured there can be no authority to disentail. On that simple ground—I do not think I can elaborate it,—I am for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitting to his Lordship to proceed.

[1] Shand v. Home, March 4, 1876, 3 R. 544; M'Donalds v. M'Donald, March 12, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 41.

No. 219. LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

July 15, 1891. Baird v. Baird. THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

W. & F. HALDANE, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 220. JAMES GEDDES, Pursuer (Appellant).—James Reid.
DAVID REID, Defender (Respondent).—Shaw—Salvesen.

July 16, 1891. Geddes v. Reid. Writ—Informality of execution—Proof—Onus—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), secs. 38 and 39.—Where a person alleged that a deed, without a testing-clause, bearing to be signed by him and by attesting witnesses had not been signed by him, and it was proved that the witnesses had signed but had not seen the alleged granter sign or heard him acknowledge the subscription, and where the person founding on the deed did not prove that the granter had signed it, held that the deed could not receive effect.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that when a deed is irregularly executed by reason of the persons signing as witnesses not having seen the granter subscribe or heard him acknowledge the subscription, the deed will be effectual if it is proved that the granter signed it.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Banffshire. I. IN 1886 James Geddes, fisherman, Portgordon, his son, George Geddes, and David Reid, an accountant in Portgordon, and formerly agent for the North of Scotland Bank, embarked in a fishing adventure, the accounts being kept by the latter. In order to provide his share of the funds, James Geddes found it necessary to borrow £65 on the security of certain house property in Portgordon of which he had a building lease. The loan was arranged by Reid on Geddes' behalf, and the latter granted a bond and assignation in security to the lender. In 1888 the house property was destroyed by fire. It had been insured through Reid's agency, and an insurance company paid Geddes for the loss a sum of £280. That sum was handed by Geddes to Reid in September 1888, with instructions that he was to pay off the bond for £65 out of the money, and Reid granted a receipt, dated 8th September 1888, bearing that the money was received "as a loan until arranged for." Reid paid off the bond for £65 in November 1889, and received the titles of the property from the lenders' agents, along with the bond and assignation and the discharge thereof.

In June 1890 James Geddes presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Banff, inter alia, for delivery to him by Reid of these title-deeds and writs.

The defender in answer founded upon and produced a letter of authority or mandate which he averred that he had received from the pursuer, and which was in these terms:—"North of Scotland Bank, Limited, incorporated under Act of Parliament, Portgordon, 28th February 1889.—This to certify that I authorise Mr David Reid, bank-agent, Portgordon, to lift the titles of my house, No. 13 Gordon Street, Portgordon, and pay the bond of £65 sterling thereon, from Messrs Mair & Macvean, solicitors, Buckie, and to retain them in security for advances made to me and my sons, and to be made by him, for the rebuilding of said house. Also authorise him to get a loan on the property, and I bind myself to sign the assignation so soon as it is ready for signature. Said loan to meet said advances. JAMES GEDDES. John Reid, witness, clerk, Portgordon; Lizzie Taylor, witness, domestic servant, 7 Gordon Square, Portgordon."

The pursuer averred, in regard to the letter of authority;—It is not signed by pursuer, is not holograph, nor tested, or stamped, is written by defender, and the designations of the witnesses were added by defender's agent when this action was raised, or immediately prior thereto, or at least sometime after the signatures were adhibited."

No. 220.
July 16, 1891.
Geddes v. Reid.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having placed the said title-deeds and writs in the hands of the defender in the manner stated, and the defender having no right or title to retain the said documents, he is bound to deliver the same to the pursuer, and decree should be granted accordingly. (3) The letter of authority founded on being neither signed by nor holograph of the pursuer, nor tested or stamped, cannot be received in evidence, and can bear no faith in judgment.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The defender is not bound to deliver up the said titles to pursuer until the pursuer pays off the defender's advance made for him, or, at all events, until pursuer makes reasonable provision for that purpose.

At the proof the defender deponed;—Upon 12th February 1889 he had received from the agents of the lender of the £65 a letter calling up the bond. On 28th February he shewed this notice to the pursuer, and obtained from the latter the letter of authority founded upon, which the defender deponed was signed in his office on the date it bore, and in presence of the witnesses, who saw the pursuer sign. The defender further explained that he had taken the letter in order to secure himself for advances made to the pursuer for the rebuilding of his house, and in place of taking an assignation of the property in his own favour.

The pursuer denied that he had ever signed the letter of authority or any document in the presence of the attesting witnesses or either of them.

John Reid, the first of the attesting witnesses, deponed that he "attended the pony, and did any office work," and was in the habit of witnessing deeds at the defender's request. He could not say that he saw the pursuer sign the document, or that he had heard the pursuer acknowledge his subscription.

Lizzie Taylor, the other attesting witness, deponed that the pursuer was not in the room when she signed the document as witness at the defender's request, that he did not sign in her presence, and that she did not remember what signature was there when she signed.

James Geddes junior, the pursuer's son, deponed that the signature of the document was not his father's.

On 10th April 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Grant) found in fact that the document, No. 5 of process, was the writ of the pursuer, and in law that the writ warranted the defender in retaining the titles of which delivery was craved; therefore sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The pursuer had at least proved that at anyrate one, if not both, of the witnesses were not present when he was alleged to have signed, and that his signature was not acknowledged to them. That being so, while the omission of this formality was no longer fatal to the deed as formerly, the onus was laid upon the defender of proving that it was the genuine writ of the pursuer.* The defender

* The Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), section 39, provides,—"No deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the grantor or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution, but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the grantor or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall lie upon the party using or upholding the same, and such proof may be led in any action or proceeding in which such deed, instrument, or writing is founded on or objected to, or in a special application to the Court of Session or to the Sheriff within whose jurisdiction the defender in any such application resides, to have it declared had failed to discharge the onus, the proof going to shew that the pursuer had never signed the writ in question. The pursuer was therefore entitled to delivery of the title-deeds.

No. 220. July 16, 1891. Geddes v. Reid.

Argued for the defender;—The writ was ex facie probative, and must receive effect as such.* The onus lay upon the pursuer to shew that the writ was forged.[1] He had failed to discharge it, and the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute must therefore stand.

LORD YOUNG.—The facts of this case are to a large extent admitted, though the record brings out some points of difference distinctly. It seems that the pursuer, his son, and the defender entered into a fishing adventure in 1886. The defender kept the accounts, and had charge of the incomings and outgoings, and that account is not settled yet, though five years have elapsed since the adventure was started. It appears that the pursuer in 1886, in order to raise money for his share of the initial expenses of the adventure, borrowed a sum of £65 on the security of some house property which he possessed in Portgordon. This property he had insured through the agency of the defender. It was burnt down in 1888, and he received the sum of £280 from the insurance office. On 8th September of that year he handed that sum to the defender on the receipt No. 8 of process. It is according to the evidence that the pursuer told the defender, when he handed him the money, that he must pay off the debt of £65 secured on the property I have mentioned. Curiously enough that was not done till Martinmas 1889, but it was done then, more than a year after the money was received, and on making application the defender got the titles of the property from the lender's agents. These are the documents which the pursuer asks now to be delivered to him.

The defender objects to restore the titles, on the ground that he holds them under a letter of authority or mandate from the pursuer dated 28th February 1889. That letter bears to be a certificate on the part of the pursuer, authorising Mr David Reid "to lift the titles of my house, No. 13 Gordon Street, Portgordon, and pay the bond of £65 sterling thereon, from Messrs Mair & Macvean, solicitors, Buckie, and to retain them in security for advances made to me and my sons, and to be made by him, for the rebuilding of said house. Also authorise him to get a loan on the property, and I bind myself to sign the assignation so soon as it is ready for signature, said loan to meet said advances."

---

that such deed, instrument, or writing was subscribed by such grantor or maker and witnesses."

* The Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874, section 38, provides,—"It shall be no objection to the probative character of a deed, instrument, or writing whether relating to land or not, that the writer or printer is not named or designed, or that the number of pages is not specified, or that the witnesses are not named or designed in the body of such deed, instrument, or writing or in the testing-clause thereof, provided that where the witnesses are not so named and designed their designations shall be appended to or follow their subscriptions; and such designations may be so appended or added at any time before the deed, instrument, or writing shall have been recorded in any register for preservation, or shall have been founded on in any Court, and need not be written by the witnesses themselves." M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies, July 20, 1876, 3 R. 1151; Thomson's Trustees v. Easson, &c., Nov. 2, 1878, 6 R. 141; Brown, Dec. 22, 1883, 11 R. 400; Addison, &c., Feb. 23, 1875, 2 R. 457.

[1] Baird's Trustee v. Murray, Nov. 21, 1883, 11 R. 153; Cleland v. Cleland, July 6, 1837, 15 S. 1246, 9 Scot. Jur. 594; Arnott, &c. v. Burt, Nov. 14, 1872, 11 Macph. 62, 45 Scot. Jur. 46.

No. 220.
July 16, 1891.
Geddes v. Reid.

When this letter of authority is produced in answer to the pursuer's claim to have his own titles delivered to him, he says that it was not signed by him. It bears his name, and the names of two attesting witnesses, John Reid and Lizzie Taylor. John Reid is designed as "clerk, Portgordon." His evidence, however, shews that he is quite an uneducated lad, and the account he himself gives is that he took charge of the defender's pony and did "any office work." In short, he was just the stable-boy. The other witness, Lizzie Taylor, was a domestic servant. Now, the pursuer swears that the signature to this document was not his, and his son says that it is not his signature. The defender, on the other hand, swears that the pursuer did sign the document. With regard to the instrumentary witnesses, the boy says that he cannot say that he saw the pursuer sign the document, and cannot say that he heard him acknowledge his subscription. He was asked if the pursuer was in the room, and he says, "I cannot recollect if Mr Geddes was present. I some think he was." The servant girl Lizzie Taylor says explicitly and distinctly that the pursuer was not in the room when she signed as witness at defender's request, that he did not sign in her presence, and never acknowledged his signature to her.

Now, what is the law on this matter? We were referred to sections 38 and 39 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and it was contended for the defender on the former clause that there being here the names of two subscribing witnesses, with designations appended to their signatures, this was a probative deed, and must receive effect, unless it was proved to be forged on such evidence as would convict a man of forgery in a criminal Court. I am going to assume, though I abstain from expressing an opinion on the point, that this is a probative instrument, and must have faith if nothing is proved to the contrary. But we have here to consider the matter on the evidence, and it is proved to my satisfaction that this document was not subscribed by the pursuer in the presence of witnesses, and that he did not acknowledge his signature to one or other of the persons subscribing as witnesses. Therefore, if the deed was executed at all by the pursuer, it was quite irregularly executed, for the law still remains that in order to the regular execution of a deed, the granter's subscription must be adhibited or acknowledged in the presence of the attesting witnesses. If there is an omission of this formality it is not now fatal to the deed as formerly, but it puts upon the party using the deed, and founding upon it, the burden of proving the deed to be genuine. My opinion in this case is founded on the proposition in fact that it may be doubtful, more or less, on the evidence whether the pursuer subscribed the deed at all, but it is quite certain that he did not do so in the presence of the witnesses, or acknowledge his signature to them. Perhaps it is proper that I should guard against any application of the rule which I hold applicable to this case being made to cases to which it is not applicable. We have no concern here to consider the case of an old deed, or the case where the attesting witnesses are dead or not to be found. Nor is there occasion to consider the case of a non memini on the part of the attesting witnesses. Cases of the denial of the authenticity of deeds are fortunately very rare, but it might frequently occur in such cases—indeed nothing could be more natural—that the attesting witnesses should have no recollection of the circumstances, and it would be quite enough for such a witness to say,—"That is my signature, and I would not have adhibited it unless the granter of the deed had signed in my presence, or acknowledged his signature to me."

I think, in considering a question of this kind, the character of the deed, the relation of the parties thereto, the circumstances of execution, and the position of the witnesses called in, must all be taken into account. Here the character of the deed was, that it was taken by an agent from his client of a sudden, and for the agent's advantage, the client having no advice or assistance but his own. The witnesses were a stable-boy and a servant girl, and the servant girl is certain that the alleged granter of the deed did not sign in her presence or acknowledge his signature to her. I therefore hold that the deed, if executed, was irregularly executed, though the consequences of the irregularity might be removed by evidence that it was really executed by the pursuer, by whom it bears to be executed.

No. 220. July 16, 1891. Geddes v. Reid.

On that last question I am of opinion that it is not proved that the pursuer ever subscribed this deed at all. I do not go the length of saying that he did not subscribe it, but I have no difficulty in saying that it is not proved that he did. That is sufficient for this part of the case, for the letter of authority or mandate, on which the defender relies as the ground for withholding the title-deeds of the pursuer, thus fails, and therefore I am of opinion that we must pronounce the order craved in the first part of the prayer.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred in the judgment proposed.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor appealed against with respect to the letter of authority or mandate dated 28th February 1889 (No. 5 of process): Find in fact, first, that it was not executed or subscribed by the pursuer in presence of the subscribing witnesses, John Reid and Lizzie Taylor, or either of them, and that neither of them saw the pursuer subscribe the same or heard him acknowledge his subscription; second, that it is not proved that the pursuer did subscribe the said letter or mandate: With respect to the title-deeds and documents specified in the prayer of the petition, find in fact, first, that they were the property of the pursuer, and that they were delivered to the defender on account of and as acting for the pursuer on the occasion of his paying at the pursuer's request, and with the pursuer's money, a debt of £65 which was incurred over the property of the pursuer to which they refer; second, that the defender has no authority or mandate by the pursuer to retain the possession or custody of the said titles and documents or to withhold them from the pursuer: Find in law that the pursuer is entitled to the order which he prays for ordaining the defender to deliver to him the said titles and documents: Therefore decern and ordain the defender to deliver to the pursuer the said titles and documents in terms of the prayer of the petition," &c.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 221. July 17, 1891. Parochial Board of Borthwick v. Parochial Board of Temple.

THE BOUNDARY COMMISSIONERS FOR SCOTLAND.

PAROCHIAL BOARD OF THE PARISH OF BORTHWICK.—Wallace—C. K. Mackenzie.

PAROCHIAL BOARD OF THE PARISH OF TEMPLE.—J. A. Reid.

Statute—Casus improvisus—Special case—Competency—Poor—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), secs. 49 and 50.—By the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 49, the Boundary Commissioners acting under the Act are empowered to provide for the adjustment and disposal of the property, debts, and liabilities of the various authorities affected by the orders pronounced by the Commissioners, and they are further (sec. 50) empowered to state a special case for the opinion of the Court of Session on any question of law.

No. 221.

July 17, 1891.

Parochial Board of Borthwick v. Parochial Board of Temple.

The Commissioners having, in pursuance of the Act, pronounced an order detaching a portion of one parish and annexing it to another parish, and the parochial boards of the parishes having applied to the Commissioners to adjust their respective liabilities consequent on this change, the Commissioners presented a special case for the opinion of the Court regarding the liabilities of the two parishes for the parochial relief of persons who were resident on the transferred portion at the date of the transference.

The Court dismissed the case, holding that it presented no question of law.

Opinions that the question was one for the determination of the Commissioners.

THIS was a special case presented by the Boundary Commissioners for Scotland acting under the Local Government Act, 1889.*

1ST DIVISION. C.

The case stated,—"By order, dated 24th November 1890, the Boundary Commissioners for Scotland declared that a detached portion of the parish of Temple, containing 228 acres or thereby, situated at or near Gorebridge, should cease to be part of the parish of Temple, and should form part of the parish of Borthwick. . . . The parochial boards of the two parishes have failed to agree as to an adjustment of liabilities consequent upon the transfer of the said detached portion, and have applied to the Boundary Commissioners to make such adjustment. Before they can do so, however, it is necessary to settle the questions of law as to the settlement of those persons who, residing in the said detached portion, possessed at the date of the transfer on 15th May 1891 a settlement by birth or residence in the parish of Temple, and who may thereafter become chargeable. The Parochial Board of Borthwick maintain that the settlement of such persons continues to be in Temple, while the Parochial Board of Temple contend that it is transferred to Borthwick. Since the date of the transfer on 15th May 1891, Alexander Wyllie, who immediately preceding that date possessed a settlement in the parish of Temple by residence in the said detached portion, has made application to the parish of Borthwick for relief, and has been temporarily relieved, pending the settlement of the questions between the two parishes."

The questions of law were—"1. Whether the settlement of the said Alexander Wyllie is still in Temple, or has been transferred to Borthwick? 2. If it be held that his settlement is in Temple, will residence

* The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 49, provides, inter alia,—"When an order under this Act has taken effect, the Boundary Commissioners may provide for the adjustment and disposal of the property, debts, and liabilities of the various authorities affected by the order, and for the settlement of differences arising out of the order."

Section 50, subsection (2), provides—"In default of an agreement as to any matter requiring adjustment for the purposes of this Act, then, if no other mode of making such adjustment is provided by this Act, such adjustment may be made or determined by the Commissioners"; and subsection (3) provides,—"The Commissioners, when making an adjustment under this Act, shall be deemed to be a single arbiter within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same, and the provisions of those Acts with respect to an arbitration shall apply accordingly; and further, the Commissioners may state a special case on any question of law for the opinion of either Division of the Inner-House of the Court of Session, who are hereby authorised finally to determine the same, along with any question of expenses."

No. 221.

July 17, 1891. Parochial Board of Borthwick v. Parochial Board of Temple.

by him for four years and a day in the said detached portion after the date of the transfer destroy his residential settlement in Temple? (3) Will a person born in the said detached portion prior to 15th May 1891, and becoming chargeable to the parish of his birth subsequent to that date, fall to be supported by the parish of Temple or by the parish of Borthwick?"

Counsel were heard for the two parishes.

Mr Sheriff Cheyne, one of the Commissioners, was also heard.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application to the Court in the form of a special case in which the Boundary Commissioners for Scotland desire to have the opinion of the Court upon a question of law, for the purpose of enabling them to adjust the respective liabilities of the parishes of Borthwick and Temple, and I fully recognise the duty of the Court to give an opinion for the guidance of the Boundary Commissioners on any question of law, and to determine any question of law so as to be binding on all parties; but the first inquiry is whether any question of law has been stated to us, and upon that I entertain a pretty strong opinion that there is no such question.

The effect of the proceedings of the Boundary Commissioners in reference to these parishes is simply this, to cut off a considerable portion of the parish of Temple from that parish, and to annex that portion to the adjoining parish of Borthwick. Now, so long as the boundaries of these parishes remain unchanged, any question of parochial liability between the two parishes, or in which their interests were involved, would of course have been a question of law upon which the parties would have been entitled to come to the Court. But here the Legislature, by passing this Act, and by the proceedings of the Commissioners in carrying out the Act, has placed these two parishes in an anomalous and not very intelligible position. The law of settlement is entirely statutory, and I do not know anything which the Court have to guide them in determining any question relating to the law of settlement except the statutes. Now, the question which we are here asked to determine is this, whether residence by the pauper for four years and a day in the detached portion of the parish after the date of the transfer will destroy his residential settlement in Temple. That must be a statutory question or not a question of law at all, and for my own part, in the long series of statutes, beginning in 1519 and culminating in the Poor-Law Act of 1845, I have been unable to find a single syllable to guide us in the determination of this question. I am therefore unable to answer the question, which I think is not a question of law, but is a question which has arisen by accident—an accident which is due, I think, to an oversight on the part of the Legislature, in altering the law in so far as the division of the parishes is concerned without making any provision as to the effect of that alteration on the law of residential settlement. The Commissioners, authorised by the Legislature, have cut off part of one parish and joined it on to another parish, and they now ask us what is to be the effect of that. But that is exactly what the Legislature ought themselves to have settled, and what, in my opinion, nobody but the Legislature can settle. It cannot be a question of common law, for common law on the subject there is none. It is not a question of statute law, for the statutes on the subject are silent. The difficulty is a difficulty created by the Legislature, and the Legislature alone can remove it. I am therefore for dismissing the case.

No. 221.

July 17, 1891.

Parochial Board of Borthwick v. Parochial Board of Temple.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion, and I only wish to add this—that if there is a remedy—and it rather appears to me that there is a remedy provided by legislative authority—that remedy is left to the Commissioners. They are the only persons to whom, as far as I can see, the Legislature has entrusted these matters, and they must just do their best.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think that under this statute the Commissioners are to adjust all questions under delegated legislative authority, and in doing so are to take a certain course in questions of law. It is plain enough that a question of settlement is a question that would be better solved by a legal authority than by one which is composed of persons who may not have had a legal training. But it does not follow that it is a question of law. It is rather a question of legislation to be settled in harmony with recognised legal principles, but at the same time one involving an act more or less arbitrary, which can be performed in a perfectly satisfactory way, I have no doubt, by the Commissioners. I am quite sure that if there had been a question of law your Lordship would have discovered it, and we should have been invited to consider it; and as there is none I concur in thinking that the only thing we can do is to dismiss the case.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The effect of the statute, as your Lordship has pointed out, is certainly to place these two parishes in a very anomalous position with reference to one another. The Legislature might have laid down some rigid rule for the purpose of regulating all the rights and liabilities of the parishes, consequent on this change, which might have been enforced by Courts of law acting according to the ordinary principles of law. But certainly we cannot find any such rule in the statute. It was not suggested that the statute contains any such rule. The whole argument was directed to the consideration of the convenience or inconvenience which might result from the solution of the present question in one way or another; none of the argument affected any question of law, or presented any question of law for our consideration. But the Legislature might have taken the course—and it rather appears to me that it is the course which the Legislature did take—of leaving these questions to be settled and adjusted on principles of convenience and common sense, as cases might arise, by the Commissioners to whom has been committed the practical resolution of the scheme of the Act. If there are any questions of convenience or of liability between these two parishes arising in consequence of the detachment of a portion of the one parish and its junction to the other, that looks like a question which the Commissioners may determine. At all events, I am quite clear, with your Lordship, that there is here presented to the Court no question of law which the Court can be asked to decide, or is capable of deciding.

THE COURT dismissed the case.

A. J. NAPIER, W.S.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 222.

July 17, 1891. Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

MRS FANNY SCOTT AND OTHERS (Scott's Trustees), First Parties.—R. V. Campbell—C. K. Mackenzie.
MRS FANNY SCOTT, Second Party.—R. V. Campbell—C. K. Mackenzie.
MRS ELIZABETH THORBURN AND ANOTHER, Third Parties.—Jameson—Cullen.

Succession—Vesting—Succession "after these payments are made."—A testator after making certain provisions for his wife and leaving legacies to each of his daughters, payable after their mother's death, declared that his son was "to succeed to whatever may remain of my estate after these payments are made, whom failing to" his daughters. The wife, the son, and the daughters all survived the testator. The son predeceased his mother and sisters. In a question between the widow as one of the heirs in mobilibus of her son, and the daughters, who claimed the whole residue as conditional institutes, held that the words "after these payments are made," did not refer to a point of time, but meant "subject to these payments," and that the residue vested in the son a morte testatoris.

1ST DIVISION. C.

DAVID SCOTT, tenant of the farm of Meadowfield, Duddingston, and of the other farms mentioned in his trust-disposition, died on 26th August 1882, leaving a holograph settlement dated in 1870, whereby he conveyed to trustees "All the heritable and moveable property which may belong to me at my death, as well as the new lease of Lochend and the leases of the other farms, also, so far as not impossible, in trust for the following purposes:—After my death the farms to be carried on for the benefit of the family, till the Martinmas and separation of the crop of the year that my son David is twenty-three. He is then to get Northfield, Meadowfield, and Heriot, and the use of all the stock and stocking on these farms till his mother's death, upon payment of £300 a-year as interest upon the stock and stocking. He will then (at his mother's death) get Lochend also, upon payment of £50 a-year to each of his sisters, so long as they remain unmarried, during the currency of the lease. I leave to my two daughters and their heirs £3000 each, payable six months after the death of their mother. And in consideration of the foregoing arrangements, my son David is to succeed to whatever may remain of my estate and effects after these payments are made; whom failing, to his wife in liferent, and her children in fee; whom failing, to my two daughters in equal value between them, as to my trustees may appear the best division. I appoint and nominate my son David Francis Scott, as above, to be my executor. My wife to live either at Meadowfield or at Lochend, as she may wish, and she is to have the liferent use of whatever furniture she may require; and if the profits of the farms and the interest on my other means will afford it, I desire that she may be allowed £500 a-year, if not, as near that sum as my trustees may think prudent."

The testator was survived by his wife, by his son David, and by two daughters.

The son died on 6th August 1888 unmarried and intestate, aged about thirty-six.

On the death of the son the testator's widow, as one of the heirs in mobilibus of her son, claimed one-third of the residue of the trust-estate on the ground that it had vested in him a morte testatoris.

The daughters maintained that the vesting of residue was postponed in respect of the direction that the son was "to succeed to whatever may remain after these payments are made" and of the destination over; and they accordingly claimed the whole residue as conditional institutes.

A special case was accordingly presented, to which the trustees were

No. 222.

July 17, 1891.
Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

the first parties, the widow was the second party, and the daughters were the third parties.

The question of law was,—"Did the residue of the trust-estate vest in the testator's son, and did the second party become entitled to one-third thereof in respect of his death without issue and intestate?"

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have clear evidence on the face of this will that the testator, though not a lawyer, was an intelligent man of business, and he has expressed himself with considerable felicity in regard to the way in which he desired his estate to be disposed of. He was engaged in farming to a large extent, having four farms.

Now, his will was made in 1870, and at that time it would appear that his only son, David, had not then attained the age of twenty-three, which he did not do until 1875. The testator died in 1882, and so he had realised before his death the fact that the condition which he had thought fit to introduce regarding his son attaining the age of twenty-three no longer operated. He had to consider how his four farms were to be carried on, and how his widow and children were to be provided for.

Now, I think he has expressed himself clearly in reference to these matters. He says,—"After my death the farms to be carried on for the benefit of the family, till the Martinmas and separation of the crop of the year that my son David is twenty-three. He is then to get Northfield, Meadowfield, and Heriot, and the use of all the stock and stocking on these farms till his mother's death, upon payment of £300 a-year as interest upon the stock and stocking." So far there is no difficulty in understanding the intention of the testator. Till he attained the age of twenty-three his son was to have nothing to do with the farms, but when he reached that age he was to have the use of the stock on the three farms mentioned till his mother's death, upon payment of £300 a-year as interest, and he was also, at his mother's death, to get Lochend, upon payment of £50 a-year to each of his sisters. Then he leaves to his two daughters and their heirs £3000 each. He then proceeds as follows,—"And in consideration of the foregoing arrangements, my son David is to succeed to whatever may remain of my estate and effects after these payments are made." Now, it is said that these words necessarily imply that until after the payments were made there was no succession in the son. Mr Jameson said there was no gift, and therefore no right to the residue accrued until after the payments were made. He read the word "after" as referable to a point of time, but I do not think that is the correct interpretation. I think that the testator meant in this clause to give his son an immediate gift, subject to the payments provided for in the preceding clause. That is the more natural meaning to give to the words used, and is also more in accordance with the general rule of law as to vesting a morte testatoris. There is nothing to militate against it. Therefore, giving due effect to the presumption of law as to vesting a morte, there is no difficulty in giving effect to the plain meaning of the testator. I am therefore of opinion that we should answer the question in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, and would only add one observation. It is no doubt laid down in the leading cases that words of conditional institution or limitation, as they are called in the House of Lords, prima facie are to be taken as referring to the distribution of the estate. But while that is so, it is also to be observed that, in determining the period of distribution, there is an important distinction where a general liferent of the estate is given with a destination of the capital at the term of distribution, and the case (which we have here) of an unlimited fee burdened with an annuity. The rule of vesting is perfectly satisfied in the latter case, and I therefore concur with your Lordships in the proposed judgment.

No. 222. July 17, 1891. Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—J. & J. MILLIGAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 223. July 18, 1891. Thain v. Thain.

DAVID THAIN, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Dickson—Law.
ALEXANDER THAIN, Defender (Respondent).—Ure—Craigie.

Trust—Adverse title made up by accepting trustee—Deathbed—Heritable and moveable—Spes successionis.—Held that a trustee under a settlement executed on deathbed did not commit a breach of trust in completing his own title as heir-at-law to the heritage conveyed, and in disregarding the deathbed conveyance in favour of a stranger.

An assignee's right to a spes successionis to heritable property, though merely a jus crediti, is a heritable right, and was subject to the law of deathbed prior to its abolition.

In 1850 A B disponed on deathbed heritable subjects to which he had merely a personal right, to C D and others, as trustees for behoof of C D in liferent, and E F in fee.

C D, who was the truster's heir-at-law, being advised that the conveyance was invalid on the ground of deathbed, and that it was unnecessary for him to reduce it, made up a title in his own person as heir-at-law, and thereafter possessed the subjects for the prescriptive period. At his death he disponed the subjects gratuitously to G H, a singular successor.

In an action of declarator and adjudication brought by E F, who claimed to have right to the subjects under the deathbed deed, against G H, the defender pleaded deathbed.

The Court assoilzied the defender, the Lord President, Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear holding that C D was entitled to complete his title as heir-at-law without regard to the invalid deathbed deed, and that as C D would have been entitled to plead deathbed when it was proponed against him, his disponee, standing on his title, was entitled to do so, Lord M'Laren holding that the defender had a prescriptive title to the lands which was not open to challenge unless his author's title was tainted by breach of trust, and that as his author was entitled to reduce the deathbed conveyance, there was no breach of trust in disregarding it.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that the defender not being an heir-at-law of the truster was not entitled to plead deathbed.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. C.

IN 1841 James Matthew Thain, proprietor of Arthurbank, a small estate in Perthshire, became insane, and his only brother and presumptive heir-at-law, Thomas Thain, was appointed his curator bonis, their cousin, David Thain primus, being cautioner.

By deed of disposition and assignation, dated 28th January 1846, in consideration of certain advances made by David Thain primus to and for behoof of James Matthew and Thomas Thain, and of an annuity of £20 which David had agreed should be paid to Thomas as a charge upon Arthurbank, Thomas sold and disponed from him, his heirs and successors, to and in favour of David, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, the estate of Arthurbank, and all right, title, and interest which he, Thomas, then had or at any time thereafter might acquire in and to the same or any part thereof under the real burden of the said annuity; and further, bound himself, upon the death of James

No. 223.
July 18, 1891.
Thain v. Thain.

Matthew, to procure himself duly and lawfully served and retoured heir to him, and infeft and seised in due and competent form in the said estate, and being thus invested, he obliged himself to infeft and seise David and his foresaids in the same, under burden of the said annuity.

David Thain primus died on 9th November 1850, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated the day before his death, by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his brother Alexander Thain primus and others as trustees, directing them, inter alia, "to convey and dispone my property of Arthurbank, all as acquired by me from Thomas Thain formerly residing there, to and in favour of my brother the said Alexander Thain, in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, and to and in favour of David Thain, my natural son, and the lawful heirs of his body in fee."

At the date of the death of David Thain primus James Matthew Thain was still alive, and consequently all that was carried by the above conveyance was the assignation to the spes successionis acquired by David under the disposition of 1846.

Alexander Thain primus accepted office as one of his brother David's trustees, but having been advised that his brother's disposition was ineffectual as regarded Arthurbank as having been granted on deathbed, he on 28th June 1852, without bringing any reduction of the trust-disposition, obtained from Thomas Thain (James Matthew Thain being by this time dead) a disposition of Arthurbank. This disposition, after narrating the previous disposition of 1846, proceeded as follows:—"And further, considering that the said David Thain died on or about the 9th day of November 1850 without lawful issue, and without having executed any legal disposition or conveyance of his right to the said lands and others disponed by me as aforesaid, and that the right to the same contained in the said disposition and assignation by me devolved in consequence upon and now belongs to Alexander Thain, residing at Arthurbank, as his only surviving brother-german, and nearest and lawful heir both of line and conquest to him; and further, considering that the said James Matthew Thain, my brother, died on the 18th day of February last, in the present year, unmarried and intestate, and that I am now his nearest and lawful apparent heir in the said lands and others; and now seeing that the said Alexander Thain, as heir foresaid of the said David Thain, has required me, in implement of the obligations undertaken by me in the said disposition and assignation before narrated, to grant the disposition underwritten, and that he has also agreed of his own proper motive that the same shall be made under burden of an annuity to me of £40 sterling per annum, payable as after mentioned, and under the further burdens hereinafter specified, which annuity and other burdens hereon are to include and be in lieu of the said annuity of £20 sterling per annum contained in the said disposition and assignation before narrated: Therefore I, the said Thomas Thain, as nearest and lawful apparent heir foresaid of the said deceased James Matthew Thain, my brother-german, have sold and disponed, as I do hereby sell, alienate, and dispone to the said Alexander Thain and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, but subject to the real burden of the annuity and other provisions in my favour hereinafter inserted, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole," &c.

Thereafter Alexander Thain primus duly completed a title to Arthurbank, and continued to possess it as proprietor in his own right till his death on 7th July 1890. During his life he granted leases and expended large sums in buildings and improvements. He left a disposition conveying it to his natural son, Alexander Thain secundus.

In October 1890 David Thain secundus, a natural son of David primus,

No. 223.
July 18, 1891.
Thain v. Thain.

and the fiar of Arthurbank under the trust-disposition of David primus, brought an action against Alexander Thain secundus for declarator that Alexander Thain primus and the other trustees of David Thain primus were upon the death of David Thain primus, and Alexander Thain primus after the death of the other trustees, lawfully vest, possessed, and seised of and in the lands and estate of Arthurbank, or of and in the spes successionis thereto acquired by David Thain primus from Thomas Thain upon trust to dispone and convey the same in the manner intended in the trust-disposition and settlement; that at the time of his death Alexander Thain primus having acquired a feudal title to the estate of Arthurbank, was so vest and seised upon trust, and was bound and obliged to dispone and convey the said lands and estate, subject to his own liferent, to and in favour of the pursuer in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement; that as he had failed to do so, and his son refused to implement his obligation, Arthurbank should be adjudged to belong to the pursuer, and that the defender should be ordained to remove therefrom.

The pursuer averred that Alexander Thain primus had acted in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme and in breach of his duty as a trustee, in obtaining the disposition in 1852 from Thomas Thain, which he had got by increasing the amount of annuity payable to the said Thomas Thain, in making up his title as fee-simple proprietor, and in keeping the pursuer in ignorance of his rights as beneficiary under the trust-deed.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender's predecessor having, from the date of his acceptance of the office of trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement condescended on, been under an obligation to convey the said lands and estate to the pursuer, and having, through the execution of the fraudulent scheme condescended on, acquired a title to the fee-simple of the said lands and estate, decree of declarator and adjudication should be pronounced as concluded for, with expenses. (2) The defender's predecessor having, from the date of his acceptance of the office of trustee aforesaid, been under an obligation to convey the said lands and estate to the pursuer, and having, contrary to his trust duty, acquired a title to the fee-simple of the said lands and estate, decree of declarator and adjudication should be pronounced as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(4) The present action is excluded by the said warrants and infeftments in favour of the said Thomas Thain and the said Alexander Thain primus, and the disposition and deed of settlement of the said Alexander Thain primus. (5) The said trust-disposition and settlement of David Thain primus having been executed on deathbed is not a habile title to heritage, and the pursuer cannot found thereon. (6) In any event, the defender and his authors having possessed said estate of Arthurbank on an ex facie valid irredeemable title recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines for more than the space of twenty years continually and together, peaceably and without any lawful interruption, the defender is entitled to decree of absolvitor, with expenses.

A proof before answer was allowed. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the foregoing narrative (in so far as the facts therein stated were in dispute), and from the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

On 22d May 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) assoilzied the defender.*

---

* "OPINION.—The defender here has prima facie a good prescriptive title to the small estate in Perthshire which is the subject of the action. That is to say, his father, who died last year, and whose general disponee he is, made up a title to, and was infeft in the estate so far back as the year 1852, and on this infeftment, which was an infeftment in fee and in all respects regular, he pos-

No. 223.

July 18, 1891.

Thain v. Thain.

The pursuer reclaimed. The argument sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.[1] sessed until his death last year, when the defender succeeded and continued his possession. The question at issue is whether the pursuer is entitled to get behind this prescriptive title, and to claim the estate in virtue of a certain trust-disposition left by David Thain, to whom the property belonged at the time of his death in 1850, and who by the trust-disposition in question left it, or attempted to leave it, to the defender's father in liferent, and to the present pursuer (his own natural son) in fee.

"The first ground on which the pursuer relies is that the possession of the defender's father up to his death in 1890 falls to be ascribed not to his infeftment in fee, but to the personal title which he held to the liferent of the estate under the trust-disposition and settlement of David Thain. I am unable to sustain this contention. The pursuer's possession must, I think, be ascribed to the title which he made up and published,—which was a title inconsistent with the trust-disposition and settlement,—and which was made up on the footing that the trust-disposition and settlement was reducible ex capite lecti. Moreover, the proof appears to me to establish that the possession had by the defender's father exhibited all the marks and qualities of possession by a fiar. I refer particularly to the leases which he granted and to the large sums spent by him on the improvement of the property and the erection of buildings upon it. The pursuer might, it will be observed, have raised the present question at any time during the period of prescription. He had always a sufficient title and interest to reduce the infeftment as an infeftment in fee, if he saw his way to do so.

"The other ground on which the pursuer relies is at first sight more formidable. It appears that the defender's father was himself a trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of his brother, David Thain, and there is no doubt that he acted in the trust as regards the administration of the moveable estate, and also in carrying on for the benefit of the legatees a certain farm of which the truster had a lease current at the time of his death. It is said that in these circumstances the title which he made up to the lands now in dispute constituted a breach of trust, that it was his duty to possess under the trust, and that, consequently, he cannot prescribe against the trust.

"I allowed before answer a proof of the facts bearing on this question, and I am now satisfied of the relevancy and also of the conclusiveness of the facts which that proof establishes. It is clearly proved that the trust-settlement in question was executed by David Thain on the day before he died, and while he was labouring under the disease of which he died. In short, it is quite clear that it was open to the defender's father, as David's brother and heir-at-law, to reduce the deed ex capite lecti. It is also clear that the only reason why this was not done was that the heir was advised that it was not necessary, and that there being no question as to his right to succeed, he might make up his title in the most convenient form without reference to the abortive conveyance in the trust-disposition and settlement. In these circumstances I cannot hold that the heir, although a trustee, violated any duty to the trust in taking the course he did. The substance of the matter must, I think, here be looked to; and it being clear that the lands in question formed truly no part of the trust-estate, I see no interest which was prejudiced by the course which the heir took, and which, it will be observed, he took openly and under competent legal advice.

"It is true that the present defender (being, as it appears, illegitimate) can-

[1] Pursuer's Authorities.—Anderson, July 15, 1760, M. 5701; Erskine, Jan. 1682, M. 5703; Beaton v. M'Donald, June 7, 1821, 1 S. 53; Trappes v. Meredith, Nov. 3, 1871, 10 Macph. 38, 44 Scot. Jur. 25; University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen, 4 R. (H. L.) 48; Aberdeen Railway Co. v. Blaikie, July 20, 1854, 17 D. (H. L.) 20, 1 Macq. 461, 26 Scot. Jur. 622; Wyse v. Abbott, July 19, 1881, 8 R. 983.

Defender's Authorities.—Crichton v. Crichton's Trustees, May 12, 1826, 4 S. 561; Hewitt's Trustees v. Lawson, March 20, 1891, ante, p. 793; Ersk. Prin. iii. 8, 49; Bell's Comm. i. 141.

No. 223. At advising,—

July 18, 1891. Thain v. Thain.

LORD KINNEAR.—The pursuer in this action claims right to certain lands called Arthurbank in Perthshire, in which the defender now stands infeft under a disposition in his favour granted by the late Alexander Thain, the late proprietor, who died in 1890, and had been infeft in the lands in dispute since 1852. There is no question that Alexander Thain's title is ex facie perfectly valid and regular, being a conveyance by Thomas Thain to him as nearest and lawful heir both of line and conquest to the deceased David Thain, who died on 9th November 1850. The lands in question had belonged to James Matthew Thain, who was under curatory as being incapable of managing his own affairs. Thomas Thain was brother and heir-at-law of James Matthew Thain, and in 1846, while James Thain was still alive, had conveyed his right of succession and all right, title, and interest which he had in the estate, for onerous causes, to David Thain. David Thain died before James, and therefore he never acquired any real right in the lands, but it is not disputed that by virtue of Thomas' conveyance he had a perfectly good personal right, contingent only on the succession opening to Thomas, and it is clear in law that this was a right which he might validly assign to others, and which, if not so assigned, might be transmissible to his heir. David Thain, who died, as I have said, on 9th November 1850, left a trust-disposition dated 8th November, the day before his death, and by this deed he directed his trustees, of whom Alexander Thain was one, to convey his estate of Arthurbank to Alexander in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and to the pursuer in fee.

The pursuer maintains that Alexander Thain, who accepted the trust and acted as a trustee, committed a breach of trust in making up the title in his own person as fiar instead of to himself in liferent only and to the pursuer in fee, and afterwards, in conveying the fee to the defender; that it was his duty as trustee to denude the fee in favour of the pursuer, and that as the defender is a gratuitous disponee he can take no benefit from his author's breach of trust, and not now bring a reduction ex capite lecti; but that does not, in my opinion, prevent his proving as part of the history of the trust, and as an answer to the suggestion of breach of trust, that the trust-settlement was ineffectual to convey the lands, and was recognised and dealt with as being so.

---

"It might have been a different matter if the defender's father could be shewn to have homologated the trust-deed prior to his taking the step of making up his adverse title. But I find no evidence, and, indeed, no averment of anything from which such homologation could be inferred. With respect to acts subsequent to the assertion of his adverse title, I do not think that they can count. But they only at best come to this—that the heir-at-law, while repudiating the trust-deed as a conveyance of the lands, yet acted in the management of the trust as a trust embracing the moveable estate. It is quite certain that he never intended to ratify the trust-deed as containing a conveyance of the lands in question.

"Some doubt was suggested as to whether the law of deathbed applied, looking to the peculiarity of David Thain's title. It appears that although in possession, he, at the time of his death, had no feudal title to the property, but only a jus crediti under a contract with a person who had a conveyance to what was then only a spes successionis. The right, however, such as it was, was a heritable right, and one which ultimately became available to David Thain's heir. And no authority was quoted to me for the proposition that the law of deathbed was confined to feudal or proper personal rights to land, and did not include rights of the nature of jura crediti."

No. 223.

July 18, 1891.
Thain v. Thain.

must now denude, as the latter would have been compelled to do had the defender not been kept in ignorance of the way in which he had made up his title. The answer is that there was no breach of trust, because the conveyance to Alexander Thain by David Thain was executed upon deathbed, and therefore was ineffectual to prejudice the right of Alexander his heir-at-law. I do not think it doubtful that that is a perfectly good answer if the facts on which it rests can be established. Alexander Thain could acquire no right in any part of the trust-estate contrary to the terms of the trust, but he was not bound by acceptance of the trust to abandon an estate which belonged to himself, and which the truster had no power to convey. The question between the parties appears to me to be a question of fact. If Alexander Thain made up his title in breach of the trust, the pursuer, whose interest he was bound to protect, will be entitled to vindicate his right to the estate notwithstanding the gratuitous conveyance to the defender. If there was no breach of trust, the pursuer has no right, and the defender must be allowed to retain his own estate.

A good deal of confusion and apparent difficulty was introduced into the argument by the defender's contention that he had acquired a prescriptive right. If there was no breach of trust, defender had no need to plead prescription, and if there was breach of trust, prescription will be of no avail to him. It is settled law, to state the doctrine in the language which was used by your Lordship in the chair in one of the cases cited to us, that no trustee can acquire by prescription a right to perpetuate a breach of trust, and since the defender is a gratuitous disponee in possession of the trustee from whom he derives his title, he can be in no more favourable position than the defaulting trustee himself. It is perfectly true that Alexander Thain, who is said to have committed this breach of trust, made up the title in his own person ex facie absolute to the fee of the estate, and possessed, after once making up that title, for his own behoof. But though that was a perfectly good absolute right as against all the world, still if it were the case that he had made up his title as heir to David Thain alone, and if David Thain had effectively conveyed the estate to Alexander in trust for the pursuer, then, as between Alexander Thain and the beneficiary under the trust, the absolute title would have been qualified by the trust obligation, and no prescriptive possession would have enabled the trustee to have got rid of this trust obligation so long as he continued to hold the property, for it is quite obvious that the positive prescription would have no effect on the personal claims affecting the trust, and it is well-settled law that the negative prescription would not extinguish this claim by long possession alone unaided by anything like repudiation or discharge. Therefore I must say for myself that during the argument I was a good deal impressed by the difficulty which the defender seemed to create for himself by this contention that he had made up a prescriptive right.

But then I think it is only necessary to state the facts of the case in order to shew what the real question between the parties is; and when it is rightly understood it seems to me to be very obvious that we have no concern in this case with any plea of prescription at all. If the defence is well founded that David Thain's deed was invalid and ineffectual to convey his right to Alexander, and thus that Alexander Thain had a perfect right to complete his title as he did at the time, it is obvious that that would have been just as good a defence for Alexander Thain if the action had been brought against him in the year he made up his title as it is to the defender now; and if it would not have been a good defence to Alexander Thain I think it can be no better for the defender as his gratuitous disponee. It appears to me therefore that the question is really one of fact.

). 223. 18, 1891. n v. n.

It is said that the defence is bad in law, because the law of deathbed while it subsisted had no application to the kind of right which was vested in David Thain. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this argument is not well founded, and for the reason which his Lordship gives, that the right even as it was was an heritable right, and one which ultimately became available to David Thain's heirs. The law as it stood at the time of David Thain's death was this—that all gratuitous deeds making over or burdening subjects which the heir would have succeeded to had they not been so conveyed, or from which he would have derived any benefit, or which tended in any degree to prejudice the heir, might be reduced on the head of deathbed. The law is so stated by Erskine, and as thus stated it appears to me to apply directly to the case in hand. The question therefore appears to me to be merely whether there was or was not any breach of trust in fact on the part of Alexander Thain; and I agree so entirely with the Lord Ordinary as to the result of the proof that I think it unnecessary to do more than repeat what his Lordship says as to the effect of the evidence. The Lord Ordinary says,—"It is clearly proved that the trust-settlement in question was executed by David Thain on the day before he died, and while he was labouring under the disease of which he died. In short, it is quite clear that it was open to the defender's father, as David's brother and heir-at-law, to reduce the deed ex capite lecti. It is also clear that the only reason why this was not done was that the heir was advised that it was not necessary, and that there being no question as to his right to succeed, he might make up his title in the most convenient form without reference to the abortive conveyance in the trust-disposition and settlement. In these circumstances I cannot hold that the heir, although a trustee, violated any duty to the trust in taking the course he did. The substance of the matter must, I think, here be looked to; and it being clear that the lands in question formed truly no part of the trust-estate, I see no interest which was prejudiced by the course which the heir took, and which, it will be observed, he took openly and under competent legal advice."

The only observation that occurs to me to add to what the Lord Ordinary has here said is with reference to his statement that this course was taken openly. I think it very clearly proved that it was known to everybody concerned. The pursuer, however, alleges on record that he was kept in ignorance of the facts of the case, and of the method in which Alexander Thain made up his title. But then he has not gone into the box to prove that he was ignorant of these facts, and therefore I think it cannot be assumed that the pursuer was really kept in ignorance of what it was important for him to know any more than any of the other persons interested in the estate of David Thain.

Now, if the facts are as the Lord Ordinary has stated them, and I think accurately, there remains only one point to be considered. It is said the defender has no right to reduce the deed ex capite lecti, because he is not the heir-at-law either of David Thain or of Alexander Thain, and if it were necessary for him to reduce David's trust-conveyance, that would, I think, be a very formidable plea. But then he is under no necessity to reduce the deed. He has no title to set aside any conveyance by David Thain in respect of a right of succession to him, but he has an undeniable right to maintain the right which has been granted him by Alexander Thain, and for that purpose to prove that his author's title was not founded on breach of trust. The material consideration is that there is no competing title which requires to be set aside, because the defender has the only title to the lands. If David Thain had been infeft in the lands, and had conveyed them mortis causa, then it would have been absolutely necessary that his conveyance should have been set aside ex capite lecti, and there can be no doubt at all that Alexander Thain would have been so advised. It is quite clear on the correspondence that the reason why he took the course he did take was, that as David Thain's deed was quite invalid and ineffectual to convey the lands, and valid only to create an obligation on him as heir, which might have been made good against him if the deed had not been executed on deathbed, he was advised that it was unnecessary for him to set aside the deed at all, as it created no effectual obstacle to completing a title in his own person, and accordingly he made up a title which is perfectly good. The only risk to which he was exposed in following this advice was that he might by death and lapse of time lose the benefit of evidence which was necessary in order to prove the fact which lies at the base of his right, that the deed in question was executed on deathbed, but fortunately for the defender, though a good many persons who were likely to be called to speak to these transactions are dead, there still remains evidence enough to establish the case. Now, that being so, I think the defender has a perfectly good answer to the action brought against him, and is not required to resort to any process of reduction whatever. The pursuer has nothing but a personal claim to compel the defender to denude of the estate in his favour, and all the defender requires to do is to shew that that would not have been a good personal claim against his author Alexander Thain, and therefore that it is not a good claim against himself. I therefore agree with the decision at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

No. 223.
July 18, 1891.
Thain v. Thain.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with Lord Kinnear, and on the same grounds.

The facts of this case are a little complicated, but they appear to be as follows,—There was a certain James Matthew Thain infeft in the lands of Arthurbank. This James Matthew Thain was a lunatic confined in an asylum. His curator was his brother Thomas, and Thomas's cautioner was David Thain. Now, it appears that this David Thain, who was a cousin of Thomas and James, had made large advances to Thomas in respect of some transaction arising out of the caution, and in respect of these advances, Thomas, who, besides being curator bonis, was at the time heir-presumptive to James, while still presumptive heir, granted to David a disposition of the lands of Arthurbank, and he also at the same time granted an obligation that he, Thomas, on the death of James, would make up a title and convey these lands to David and his heirs and successors. That was in 1846. James Matthew Thain died in 1852, predeceased by David, who died in 1850. Alexander, the defender's father, was David's heir, and he (Alexander) called upon Thomas to implement his obligation of 1846, which Thomas did, by disponing the lands of Arthurbank on 9th March 1852 to Alexander absolutely. Alexander made up his title and possessed on that disposition until 7th July 1890, when he died. By disposition dated 21st November 1872, Alexander conveyed to his son, the present defender, these lands of Arthurbank. Accordingly the father and son had possessed ever since 1852 these lands on an ex facie absolute title in their own person.

Now, I agree with Lord Kinnear that if a person is in possession on such a

No. 223.

July 18, 1891.
Thain v. Thain.

title he requires no assistance from prescription to support his title. That is the position of the defender here. He holds these lands on an absolute disposition derived from his father. Nobody seeks to reduce that title, and there is no competing title. The only case made on record is this—that the defender's father, Alexander, during all that time from 1852 till his death was under an obligation to convey these lands to his brother David's trustees, and accordingly this action is brought to have it found and declared that Alexander, the defender, was under this obligation, and on his failing to implement that obligation, to have the lands adjudged. Accordingly, it appears to me that the only question we have to decide is whether or not Alexander Thain, in the year 1852 and downwards, was under an obligation to convey these lands, to which he had made up a fee-simple title, to the trustees under David's trust-deed.

That question depends upon the disposition granted by David Thain. David died in 1850, predeceasing, as I have said, Thomas Thain, but he left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 8th November 1850, in favour of the elder Alexander and three other trustees, by which he conveyed to them his whole estates, and directed them to dispone Arthurbank to Alexander Thain in liferent, and to the pursuer David, the truster's natural son, in fee. It is said that that was a binding obligation upon Alexander, and that is the obligation which Alexander's son, the defender, is now called upon to fulfil.

It appears to me that if David's trust conveyance was then, and is now, to be treated as a valid and unreducible conveyance, the pursuer possibly might be entitled to prevail. But I agree with Lord Kinnear and the Lord Ordinary that the circumstances in which this trust-disposition was executed were these—it was executed on 8th November 1850; the granter of it, David, died the next day, 9th November 1850, and when he executed it he was ill of the disease of which he died. I think that on the evidence these facts are clear beyond any doubt, and therefore this was a disposition which was reducible at any moment by Alexander Thain. The result of that is that these lands of Arthurbank were de facto the property of Alexander Thain. The question then comes to be—if these lands were de facto the property of Alexander, whether or not he was under any obligation to convey them to the trustees. I think that he was under no obligation to convey them, and that he committed no breach of trust in not conveying them. They were his own property, and I cannot see how there should be obligation on Alexander, simply because he happened to be a trustee under David's trust, to convey his own property to the trustees.

I agree with Lord Kinnear that in certain circumstances it might have been necessary to reduce this deed. If for example, David had been in point of fact infeft in these lands and had conveyed them under a disposition under which the trustees might have completed a title to them and possessed them, in that case it would have been necessary for Alexander to come forward and reduce that disposition if he desired the property. But that was not the position of matters here. It is obvious that the trustees could make up no title to these lands without the assistance of Alexander, who was the heir, or by bringing an action of adjudication against him. If Alexander chose to make up a title, the only other course was just what has been taken here—the raising of an action of implement and adjudication. It is obvious that if such an action had been raised during Alexander's life he would have had a complete answer. He would have said, as the defender says now,—"This is a deed reducible ex capite lecti." He consulted his advisers, and they took that view. His agent told him that he need not reduce this deed unless a challenge was brought. No such challenge was brought during all his life. That perhaps was not very prudent advice, for he exposed himself to the risk of losing evidence. It is fortunate for the defender that there is preserved evidence, to my mind conclusive, that this deed was reducible ex capite lecti, but if the facts had been otherwise, and the defender had been unable to prove that the deed was reducible ex capite lecti, I do not see very well what answer he would have had. But that is not the state of facts, and I agree that the defender is entitled to shew the true state of matters, and to prove that in point of fact this deed was a deed reducible ex capite lecti. The deed conferred on the pursuer a personal claim only on Alexander to convey; and I think, with Lord Kinnear, that that being the nature of the case, it is an answer to this personal claim that Alexander could and would have shewn at any time during his life that no such personal claim existed against him. I think that no such claim existed against the defender's author, and therefore I think no such claim exists against the present defender.

I only wish to add that, as it is averred on record, and is a ground of this action, that this was a case of fraud, and that all this title was made up in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme to defeat the pursuer's right under the trust-disposition, I see no trace whatever of fraud on the face of these proceedings. I think that everything was done by Alexander Thain in the most open way possible. There was no concealment. I think that the other trustees and everybody else concerned knew perfectly well the state of the title and the facts; and I agree with Lord Kinnear that we are entitled to conclude from the non-appearance of the pursuer in the witness-box that he knew as well as other people the true state of the facts in this matter. On the whole matter I concur with Lord Kinnear in thinking that the defender should be assoilzied.

LORD M'LAREN.—I had not intended to express any separate opinion in this case, because I concur in great part with the complete and lucid exposition of this case which has been given by Lord Kinnear; but after hearing his Lordship's opinion there is one point not affecting the result of the case, but one on which I think there is a slight divergence of view, and perhaps it is right I should state what that is.

In my view, I am not able altogether to disregard the element of prescription or assertion of prescriptive right on the part of the defender. The case arises in this way, if I may summarise so much of the facts as is necessary to bring out my view:—The defender, or rather the immediate author of the defender, was in a position to make up a title to this little property as heir-at-law, and he was also one of three trust disponees under a conveyance of the same property. He made up his title as heir-at-law, and in so doing he acted quite legally, but having made up that title he was, but for a plea of deathbed, under an obligation to give the benefit of this title to the trust—to grant a deed in implement of the trust which he had accepted. Now, he did not do that, for reasons which are probably quite satisfactory; but supposing that prescription had not run upon the title of heir-at-law which was made up by the defender here, then it appears to me the defender would have had no answer to the present action, because he would have been in the position of a person sued on the obligation which lies upon every heir to implement his ancestor's trust-deed, and, on the other hand, he would not have been in a position to reduce that deed ex capite lecti founding on his individual right, because it was quite settled in the law of Scotland that no one but the heir can bring an action of reduction ex capite lecti. It appears to me that the defender takes benefit by prescription in this way—that he has a good title by prescription against any adverse claim excepting one founded on breach of trust, and if it can be shewn that he has committed a breach of trust his prescriptive title would be of no avail. But, then, on the question of breach of trust, it appears to me, in accordance with a rule of wide application, that the strict rules of evidence and rules of law are to a certain extent broken down, so that anyone who is charged with breach of trust may shew by all competent evidence that he has acted honestly. And therefore though the defender is not in the position of bringing a reduction ex capite lecti, yet he is obliged to defend his author against a charge of breach of trust, and so shew in point of fact that the deed was executed on deathbed, and that therefore his author committed no fraud in making up his title and neglecting to convey to the trust. Having established that point, he then falls back on his prescriptive title, which is a perfectly good title against any other competing right except one founded on the trust-deed. The view I take has only a theoretical difference from that suggested by Lord Kinnear and, as I understand, concurred in by Lord Adam, but they both lead to the same result—that both in law and substantial justice the claim of the defender is well founded.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Kinnear.

THE COURT adhered.

REID & GUILD, W.S.—GORDON-PETRIE & SHAND, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN YATES, Petitioner.—Lorimer.
WILLIAM ROBERTSON, Respondent.—Crabb Watt.

Sheriff—Proof—Loss of shorthand writer's notes—Nobile officium.—When the shorthand writer's notes of the testimony of certain witnesses in a proof taken in a Sheriff Court action had been accidentally destroyed, the Court, on the petition of the pursuer, which was opposed by the defender, remitted to the Sheriff to take the evidence of these witnesses of new, but expressed the opinion that the Sheriff might have allowed the evidence to be taken of new without such authority.

JOHN YATES, labourer in Aberdeen, presented this petition, in which he stated that he was pursuer of a petitory action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against William Robertson, farmer, Old Machar; that the proof in the action was taken on 17th February 1891; that part of the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence of his witnesses had been accidentally destroyed, and that the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton Grierson) had refused to allow the witnesses whose evidence had thus been lost to be re-examined, on the ground that he had no power to do so. He therefore prayed the Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium, to remit to the Sheriff-substitute to take the evidence of these witnesses of new, and to deal with the evidence so taken as part of the proof in the cause.

Robertson lodged answers, admitting the facts stated, but objecting to the petition being granted. He stated,—"The only evidence adduced for the pursuer was that of his wife and children. The proof shewed that the children had been tutored to corroborate the pursuer and his wife. They broke down in almost all essential particulars, and their evidence was shewn to be unreliable. The respondent therefore did not think it necessary to call any witnesses. Although the official shorthand writer's notes have been lost, the evidence was taken down verbatim by another newspaper reporter, who was present at the trial. Subject to revisal by the Sheriff-substitute, these notes would form a sufficient record of the proof. The defender's agent offered to adjust the said notes of evidence with the pursuer's agent, and to submit them for revisal to the Sheriff-substitute, but the pursuer, because of their damaging effect upon his case, refused to accept them as the record. Six months have elapsed since the date of the proof, and the loss of the official notes. In the interval the pursuer has had ample opportunity to improve his case. The defender believes and avers, that it is solely with the object and hope of extracting more reliable testimony from his wife and children that the pursuer now seeks to have the evidence led over again. The defender will be greatly prejudiced if the petition is granted, and he submits that, consistently with fairness to the defender, the pursuer ought to adopt the only competent remedy provided by the law in such circumstances."

No. 224.
July 18, 1891.
Yates v. Robertson.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am rather inclined to think that this matter might have been set right in the Sheriff Court; but the Sheriff-substitute had a scruple as to his power to allow the evidence to be taken over again. Whether he consulted the Sheriff we are not informed, but I am not surprised at his scruple, for this certainly is rather an unusual occurrence. I do not, however, see any reason for not granting the prayer of the petition, and so removing the difficulty that has occurred in the Sheriff Court.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition.

AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—WISHART & MACNAUGHTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 225.
July 18, 1891.
Simpson v. Simpson.

MRS BARBARA MACDOUGALL OR SIMPSON, Petitioner.—P. J. Blair.
THOMAS SIMPSON AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Strachan.

Judicial factor—Curator bonis—Appointment pending brieve of cognition.—Circumstances in which the Court appointed the nearest male agnate, of full age, who was suing a brieve of cognition, to be curator bonis to an insane person.

1ST DIVISION. C.

ON 15th June 1891 Mrs Barbara Macdougall or Simpson, wife of Donald Simpson, wine and spirit merchant, Lochalsh Road, Inverness, presented a petition for the appointment of a curator bonis to her husband, who was then an inmate of the Saughtonhall Asylum, Edinburgh. The petitioner suggested a chartered accountant in Inverness for the office.

Answers were lodged by Thomas Simpson and J. A. Simpson, brothers of Donald Simpson, and his nearest male agnates other than an infant son of him and the petitioner. The respondents admitted the insanity of their brother, but averred that his business was a "counter" business, which could not successfully be carried on by a chartered accountant, or by anyone not practically acquainted with the trade. They then stated that they had come to the conclusion that Thomas Simpson, the nearest agnate of full age, should, in the interest of his brother and his family, exercise his right as legal guardian of the ward and assume the management of the estate; and that Thomas Simpson accordingly had obtained a brieve from Chancery under the Court of Session Act, 1868, and was in process of carrying out the other proceedings necessary for his appointment as tutor-at-law to his brother.

The Lord Ordinary (Low) reported the petition.*

* "NOTE.— . . . It therefore appears that there is no dispute as to the insanity of Donald Simpson, but that the only question is, who is to have the

No. 225.
July 18, 1891.
Simpson v. Simpson.

The petitioner lodged a note, in which she stated that there were questions in dispute between the parties which made it desirable that the business should be managed by a neutral person.

The respondents argued that the petition for the appointment of a curator bonis ought to be superseded till the result of the depending brieve of cognition had been ascertained.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I should suggest that the nearest agnate, who is at present prosecuting a brieve of cognition, should be appointed curator bonis in the meantime. He will be required to find caution, so that I do not see that anyone has any interest to object.

Neither party stating any objection to the course proposed by his Lordship, the Court accordingly made the appointment.

FORRESTER & DAVIDSON, W.S.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 226.
July 18, 1891.*
Cochrane v. Stevenson.

THE LADY GERTRUDE COCHRANE AND SPOUSE, Pursuers (Respondents). —Ure—Pitman.

WILLIAM STEVENSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—C. J. Guthrie—Burnet.

Heritable and Moveable—Fixtures—Pictures.—In a question between the purchaser and seller of a mansion-house, held that a picture, valued at £100, painted on canvas, and inserted as a panel above the fire-place in the dining-room, was moveable, although its removal left exposed a stone and lime wall.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. C.

BY minute of sale, dated 31st December 1886, the trustees of the Earl of Glasgow sold the mansion-house of Hawkhead to William Stevenson, and a formal disposition was subsequently granted in June 1887.

On 29th October 1890 Lady Gertrude Cochrane and her husband, Mr Thomas Cochrane, as purchasers from Lord Glasgow and his trustees of the furniture and other moveable subjects in the mansion-house of Hawkhead, brought an action against Stevenson, the purchaser of the lands and house, for declarator that three pictures in the dining-room of the house belonged to them as being moveable property.

The defender pleaded that the pictures in question were heritable, and formed part of the house.

A proof was allowed. The following was the import of the evidence. The pictures in question were full-length portraits of Lord and Lady Wharton, by an unknown artist, supposed to be a pupil of Lely, and a full-length portrait of King Charles II., supposed to be by Lely himself. Mr Dowell, auctioneer and valuer, Edinburgh, valued the Wharton management of his estate. It was stated by the counsel for the petitioner that there are serious objections to the management being entrusted to the respondent Thomas Simpson.

---

"I am informed that a precept has been issued under the brieve in terms of section 1 of the Act of Sederunt of 3d December 1868, fixing the 18th inst. as the first diet of compearance. At that diet the claim of Thomas Simpson to the office of curator will, I apprehend, be brought up under section 2 of this Act of Sederunt.

"In these circumstances, I doubt if it would be proper for me to appoint a curator; but as there is no question that Donald Simpson is insane, and as the cognition is only brought for the purpose of enabling Thomas Simpson to obtain the management of the estate, it appears to me that the best course is to report the case."

[1] Irving v. Swan, Nov. 7, 1868, 7 Macph. 86, 41 Scot. Jur. 50.

* Decided July 10, 1891.

No. 226.
July 18, 1891.
Cochrane v. Stevenson.

pictures at 50 guineas a-piece, and the Charles II. at 250 guineas. Mr W. C. Angus, art-dealer, Glasgow, valued the Whartons at £10 each, and the Charles II. at £100. The Charles II. was said to be a replica of a picture the original of which is in Windsor Castle. All the pictures were painted on canvas stretched on wooden stretching frames in the usual way. The frames of the Wharton pictures were ordinary gilt picture frames attached to the wall; the frame of the Charles II., which was above the fire-place, was a mirror frame, with pilasters on either side, constituting part of the plaster ornamentation of the room. The space behind that picture was a bare stone and lime wall, that behind the Wharton pictures was wood, although the parties were in dispute as to whether it was finished panelling like the rest of the room, or merely unplaned wood. The pictures had not been taken down for the purposes of the proof, but the Charles had been taken out to be cleaned in 1874.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) found and declared in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, and ordained the defender to deliver to the pursuers the three pictures therein mentioned.*

---

* "OPINION.—The question in this case arises between the seller and purchaser of the estate of Hawkhead, and relates to three pictures in the dining-room of the mansion-house, which are claimed by the purchaser as forming part of the house, and as therefore conveyed to him under the general terms of his disposition. These terms, I may say, are in no way exceptional, the conveyance being of the lands as described by boundaries, and all houses and buildings thereon.

"The pictures in question are full-length portraits—two of them of Lord and Lady Wharton, and the third of King Charles II. The two first are by an unknown artist, supposed, however, to be one Raleigh, a pupil of Sir Peter Lely. The other—that of the King—is said to be by Sir Peter Lely himself, and to be a replica of a picture the original of which is in Windsor Castle. Mr Dowell values it at 250 guineas, and is satisfied of its authenticity. Mr W. C. Angus on the other side considers it only a copy, and values it at 100 guineas. The other two pictures are valued by Mr Dowell at 50 guineas each, and by Mr W. C. Angus at about 10 guineas each.

"All three pictures are painted on canvas stretched on wooden stretching frames in the usual way; and each picture is enclosed in a frame in which it could be moved about and hung upon or attached to any suitable wall. The frames of the Wharton portraits are ordinary gilt frames prepared by a gilder. The frame of the King's picture again is a mirror frame, the glass of the mirror having apparently at some time been removed, and the picture—stretched on its stretching-frame—inserted in its place. The three pictures as thus framed are attached to the walls by plates at the top and along the sides, similar to the plate shewn on the model, No. 25 of process; and there is in each case round the outside of the frame a moulding known as a dust moulding, which is fastened to the frame and wall by sprigs, and which serves to conceal the plates, and also to prevent dust from getting into the space behind the picture. The moveable piece in No. 25 represents this dust moulding. The walls of the rooms are panelled in painted wood as shewn in the photographs, and the frames of the pictures are in each case fastened to the panelling as above described. But there is some uncertainty (which I think might have been avoided, and for which the defender seems responsible) as to what lies behind the Wharton pictures. The pursuers' witnesses say that behind those pictures the panelling of the wall is continued, the pictures being simply placed on the finished though perhaps unpainted panel. The defender's witnesses—while not disputing that behind the pictures there is woodwork flush with the rest of the panelling—say that the woodwork is rough and unfinished, and that they can find no trace of mouldings such as they would expect if the panelling was continuous. With respect to the King's picture, both parties are agreed that at that place the panelling has been either cut out or left unfinished—the space

No. 226.

July 18, 1891.
Cochrane v. Stevenson.

The defender reclaimed.[1]
At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defender, Mr Stevenson, in December 1886 purchased behind the picture (which is over the fire-place) being apparently a stone and lime wall.

"I am disposed on the question as to what is behind the Wharton pictures to prefer the evidence of the pursuers. The probability I think is that the panelling extends under the pictures, but at the same time, that in view of pictures being placed over it, the panelling there has not been painted, and perhaps not fully dressed. So far as continuance of the moulding is of importance, I do not see that the examination made by either party was fitted to ascertain the state of the fact. As regards all the pictures, my impression of the history of the matter is that when the room was being decorated there were certain places where it was contemplated to place mirrors or pictures—that where mirrors were to be placed the panelling was either omitted or cut away to prevent the mirrors projecting too much—and that where pictures were to be placed, the panelling was not finished so highly as over the rest of the room. I think further it may be taken as more than probable that when the room was converted (as it was) from a drawing-room into a dining-room, the mirror above the fire-place was taken out from its frame, and the picture of the King substituted as more suitable for a dining-room.

"I should add that on the same wall as the Wharton pictures there was a mirror—as shewn in the photograph—having an ordinary mirror frame, and fastened to the wall in the same way as the pictures, but having behind it no panelling, but only lath and plaster; and perhaps it is not without importance that this mirror was treated by both parties as moveable, and removed by the pursuers after the sale without objection.

"I think these are all the important facts, except perhaps this that the frame of the King's picture—originally, as I have said, a mirror frame—while not bearing any relation to the cornice or panelling of the room, does appear to bear a relation to the pilasters and other decorations around the mantelpiece. That is to say, it (the frame) and the pilasters appear to have been introduced at the same time, and, in style, to harmonise with one another. There is no such relation between the frames of the Wharton pictures and the other mouldings on the wall.

"Upon these facts it seems clear enough that all three pictures would be moveable as between landlord and tenant; that is to say, they could all be easily removed without injury to themselves or to the walls of the house. But the defender says that they would be heritable as between heir and executor, and that the law as between seller and purchaser is the same as between heir and executor.

"I am not at all satisfied that the law on this subject as between heir and executor necessarily rules as between seller and purchaser. As between the latter the question must always be, What is the meaning of the contract? and in such cases there may be elements of construction available which may altogether supersede the legal presumptions. I shall consider presently whether there are not some such elements here; but in the meantime this seems at least certain, that the inferences and presumptions deducible from the nature of the article may be much more important and to the point as between buyer and seller than as between heir and executor. For example, supposing the question had here been as to family portraits—say of near relations of the seller; or the mansion-house of Hawkhead and certain lands along with it from the trustees of the late Earl of Glasgow. There was an arrangement about the then sub-supposing the pictures had been say Raphaels or Murillos, worth as much perhaps as the fee-simple of the estate, that circumstance might, as between heir and executor, have been of little moment; but, as between purchaser and seller, it must have been almost conclusive. And although it is true that the pictures in question are not (as it now appears) family portraits, or, at least, portraits of near relatives, and only one of them is of special value, yet they are all works of art, having a value otherwise than as mere decorations, and certainly not a kind of article which generally goes with a house when a house is sold.

[1] Defender's Authorities.—Cave v. Cave, 1705, 2 Vern. 508; Fisher v. Dixon, June 26, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 382; D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, 1866, L. R., 3 Eq. 382.

Pursuer's Authorities.—Beck v. Rebow, 1706, 1 Peere Williams, 92; Birch v. Dawson, 1834, 2 Ad. and Ellis, 37; Dowall v. Miln, July 11, 1874, 1 R. 1180; Nisbet v. Mitchell Innes, Feb. 20, 1880, 7 R. 575.

"Accordingly I do not think that it is a satisfactory way of viewing the question to take it simply as if it had arisen between Lord Glasgow's heirs and Lord Glasgow's executors. At all events, in considering the authorities, I confess I prefer, at least in the first instance, to consider those cases which have occurred like the present, between buyer and seller. And here—as it happens—the authorities appear to be uniform.

"The leading case in England on the subject, and the only case in which—so far as I can discover—a question as to pictures, mirrors, and such like articles of ornament has been decided as between buyer and seller, is the case of Beck v. Rebow, 1 P. W. 94. In that case the Lord Keeper of the day held that hangings and looking-glasses fixed to the walls of a house by nails and screws, although put up in lieu of wainscot and having no wainscot underneath, were only matters of ornament and furniture, and did not pass to a purchaser as part of the house or freehold. And according to Amos & Ferrard on Fixtures this decision has been frequently cited and approved by the English Courts. It appears also that the case of Harvey v. Harvey which followed upon it (although itself a case between heir and executor) is expressly recognised as law by Mr Justice Buller in his treatise on the law of nisi prius. (Buller's N. P., p. 34, 7th ed.)

"The only Scotch case of the kind as between buyer and seller is that of Nisbet v. Mitchell Innes, 7 R. 575, where it was held by the Lord Ordinary and the Court that while tile hearths passed with a house sold in general terms, the purchaser was not entitled to built-in grates, lustres, gas-brackets, picture-rods, or a mirror used as a sliding shutter.

"I am not aware of any decision relating to ornamental articles, and arising between buyer and seller other than those two. It may be noticed, however, that Lord Hardwick in Ex parte Quincy, 1 Atk. 477, appears to have held that the fixed utensils of a brewhouse would not pass with a conveyance of the brewhouse with its accompaniments; although, on the other hand, in Colgrave v. Dias Santos, 2 Barnwell and Cresswell, 76, the Court of Queen's Bench appears to have held that upon a contract for the sale of a house, wash-tubs, grates, closets, shelves, &c., passed with the house to the purchaser.

"Following, therefore, the only cases which appear strictly in point, I am prepared in this case to find for the pursuers; and I am the more willing to do so because I consider upon the correspondence and proof, that the claim to these pictures on the part of the defender was somewhat of an afterthought—the actings of parties subsequent to the sale making it, in my opinion, sufficiently clear that neither of them intended these pictures to pass as part of the house. I refer particularly to the fact that in the reference between the parties as to the apportionment of the rent paid by Mr Lye, the tenant of the house and furniture, the pictures in question were treated by both parties as part of the furniture; and were included in valuations of the furniture laid by both parties before the arbiters. I might also perhaps refer to what I have already mentioned, viz., the removal by the pursuers, without objection, of the mirror at the side of the room, which was certainly as much a fixture as any of the pictures in dispute.

"As, however, the case may go further, and the question may be elsewhere

No. 223.
July 18, 1891.
Thain v. Thain.

good defence to Alexander Thain I think it can be no better for the defender as his gratuitous disponee. It appears to me therefore that the question is really one of fact.

It is said that the defence is bad in law, because the law of deathbed while it subsisted had no application to the kind of right which was vested in David Thain. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this argument is not well founded, and for the reason which his Lordship gives, that the right even as it was was an heritable right, and one which ultimately became available to David Thain's heirs. The law as it stood at the time of David Thain's death was this—that all gratuitous deeds making over or burdening subjects which the heir would have succeeded to had they not been so conveyed, or from which he would have derived any benefit, or which tended in any degree to prejudice the heir, might be reduced on the head of deathbed. The law is so stated by Erskine, and as thus stated it appears to me to apply directly to the case in hand. The question therefore appears to me to be merely whether there was or was not any breach of trust in fact on the part of Alexander Thain; and I agree so entirely with the Lord Ordinary as to the result of the proof that I think it unnecessary to do more than repeat what his Lordship says as to the effect of the evidence. The Lord Ordinary says,—"It is clearly proved that the trust-settlement in question was executed by David Thain on the day before he died, and while he was labouring under the disease of which he died. In short, it is quite clear that it was open to the defender's father, as David's brother and heir-at-law, to reduce the deed ex capite lecti. It is also clear that the only reason why this was not done was that the heir was advised that it was not necessary, and that there being no question as to his right to succeed, he might make up his title in the most convenient form without reference to the abortive conveyance in the trust-disposition and settlement. In these circumstances I cannot hold that the heir, although a trustee, violated any duty to the trust in taking the course he did. The substance of the matter must, I think, here be looked to; and it being clear that the lands in question formed truly no part of the trust-estate, I see no interest which was prejudiced by the course which the heir took, and which, it will be observed, he took openly and under competent legal advice."

The only observation that occurs to me to add to what the Lord Ordinary has here said is with reference to his statement that this course was taken openly. I think it very clearly proved that it was known to everybody concerned. The pursuer, however, alleges on record that he was kept in ignorance of the facts of the case, and of the method in which Alexander Thain made up his title. But then he has not gone into the box to prove that he was ignorant of these facts, and therefore I think it cannot be assumed that the pursuer was really kept in ignorance of what it was important for him to know any more than any of the other persons interested in the estate of David Thain.

Now, if the facts are as the Lord Ordinary has stated them, and I think accurately, there remains only one point to be considered. It is said the defender has no right to reduce the deed ex capite lecti, because he is not the heir-at-law either of David Thain or of Alexander Thain, and if it were necessary for him to reduce David's trust-conveyance, that would, I think, be a very formidable plea. But then he is under no necessity to reduce the deed. He has no title to set aside any conveyance by David Thain in respect of a right of succession to him, but he has an undeniable right to maintain the right which has been granted him by Alexander Thain, and for that purpose to prove that his author's title was not founded on breach of trust. The material consideration is that there is no competing title which requires to be set aside, because the defender has the only title to the lands. If David Thain had been infeft in the lands, and had conveyed them mortis causa, then it would have been absolutely necessary that his conveyance should have been set aside ex capite lecti, and there can be no doubt at all that Alexander Thain would have been so advised. It is quite clear on the correspondence that the reason why he took the course he did take was, that as David Thain's deed was quite invalid and ineffectual to convey the lands, and valid only to create an obligation on him as heir, which might have been made good against him if the deed had not been executed on deathbed, he was advised that it was unnecessary for him to set aside the deed at all, as it created no effectual obstacle to completing a title in his own person, and accordingly he made up a title which is perfectly good. The only risk to which he was exposed in following this advice was that he might by death and lapse of time lose the benefit of evidence which was necessary in order to prove the fact which lies at the base of his right, that the deed in question was executed on deathbed, but fortunately for the defender, though a good many persons who were likely to be called to speak to these transactions are dead, there still remains evidence enough to establish the case. Now, that being so, I think the defender has a perfectly good answer to the action brought against him, and is not required to resort to any process of reduction whatever. The pursuer has nothing but a personal claim to compel the defender to denude of the estate in his favour, and all the defender requires to do is to shew that that would not have been a good personal claim against his author Alexander Thain, and therefore that it is not a good claim against himself. I therefore agree with the decision at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with Lord Kinnear, and on the same grounds.

The facts of this case are a little complicated, but they appear to be as follows,—There was a certain James Matthew Thain infeft in the lands of Arthurbank. This James Matthew Thain was a lunatic confined in an asylum. His curator was his brother Thomas, and Thomas's cautioner was David Thain. Now, it appears that this David Thain, who was a cousin of Thomas and James, had made large advances to Thomas in respect of some transaction arising out of the caution, and in respect of these advances, Thomas, who, besides being curator bonis, was at the time heir-presumptive to James, while still presumptive heir, granted to David a disposition of the lands of Arthurbank, and he also at the same time granted an obligation that he, Thomas, on the death of James, would make up a title and convey these lands to David and his heirs and successors. That was in 1846. James Matthew Thain died in 1852, predeceased by David, who died in 1850. Alexander, the defender's father, was David's heir, and he (Alexander) called upon Thomas to implement his obligation of 1846, which Thomas did, by disponing the lands of Arthurbank on 9th March 1852 to Alexander absolutely. Alexander made up his title and possessed on that disposition until 7th July 1890, when he died. By disposition dated 21st November 1872, Alexander conveyed to his son, the present defender, these lands of Arthurbank. Accordingly the father and son had possessed ever since 1852 these lands on an ex facie absolute title in their own person.

Now, I agree with Lord Kinnear that if a person is in possession on such a

No. 223.

July 18, 1891.
Thain v. Thain.

title he requires no assistance from prescription to support his title. That is the position of the defender here. He holds these lands on an absolute disposition derived from his father. Nobody seeks to reduce that title, and there is no competing title. The only case made on record is this—that the defender's father, Alexander, during all that time from 1852 till his death was under an obligation to convey these lands to his brother David's trustees, and accordingly this action is brought to have it found and declared that Alexander, the defender, was under this obligation, and on his failing to implement that obligation, to have the lands adjudged. Accordingly, it appears to me that the only question we have to decide is whether or not Alexander Thain, in the year 1852 and downwards, was under an obligation to convey these lands, to which he had made up a fee-simple title, to the trustees under David's trust-deed.

That question depends upon the disposition granted by David Thain. David died in 1850, predeceasing, as I have said, Thomas Thain, but he left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 8th November 1850, in favour of the elder Alexander and three other trustees, by which he conveyed to them his whole estates, and directed them to dispone Arthurbank to Alexander Thain in liferent, and to the pursuer David, the truster's natural son, in fee. It is said that that was a binding obligation upon Alexander, and that is the obligation which Alexander's son, the defender, is now called upon to fulfil.

It appears to me that if David's trust conveyance was then, and is now, to be treated as a valid and unreducible conveyance, the pursuer possibly might be entitled to prevail. But I agree with Lord Kinnear and the Lord Ordinary that the circumstances in which this trust-disposition was executed were these—it was executed on 8th November 1850; the granter of it, David, died the next day, 9th November 1850, and when he executed it he was ill of the disease of which he died. I think that on the evidence these facts are clear beyond any doubt, and therefore this was a disposition which was reducible at any moment by Alexander Thain. The result of that is that these lands of Arthurbank were de facto the property of Alexander Thain. The question then comes to be—if these lands were de facto the property of Alexander, whether or not he was under any obligation to convey them to the trustees. I think that he was under no obligation to convey them, and that he committed no breach of trust in not conveying them. They were his own property, and I cannot see how there should be obligation on Alexander, simply because he happened to be a trustee under David's trust, to convey his own property to the trustees.

I agree with Lord Kinnear that in certain circumstances it might have been necessary to reduce this deed. If for example, David had been in point of fact infeft in these lands and had conveyed them under a disposition under which the trustees might have completed a title to them and possessed them, in that case it would have been necessary for Alexander to come forward and reduce that disposition if he desired the property. But that was not the position of matters here. It is obvious that the trustees could make up no title to these lands without the assistance of Alexander, who was the heir, or by bringing an action of adjudication against him. If Alexander chose to make up a title, the only other course was just what has been taken here—the raising of an action of implement and adjudication. It is obvious that if such an action had been raised during Alexander's life he would have had a complete answer. He would have said, as the defender says now,—"This is a deed reducible ex capite lecti." He consulted his advisers, and they took that view. His agent told him that he need not reduce this deed unless a challenge was brought. No such challenge was brought during all his life. That perhaps was not very prudent advice, for he exposed himself to the risk of losing evidence. It is fortunate for the defender that there is preserved evidence, to my mind conclusive, that this deed was reducible ex capite lecti, but if the facts had been otherwise, and the defender had been unable to prove that the deed was reducible ex capite lecti, I do not see very well what answer he would have had. But that is not the state of facts, and I agree that the defender is entitled to shew the true state of matters, and to prove that in point of fact this deed was a deed reducible ex capite lecti. The deed conferred on the pursuer a personal claim only on Alexander to convey; and I think, with Lord Kinnear, that that being the nature of the case, it is an answer to this personal claim that Alexander could and would have shewn at any time during his life that no such personal claim existed against him. I think that no such claim existed against the defender's author, and therefore I think no such claim exists against the present defender.

I only wish to add that, as it is averred on record, and is a ground of this action, that this was a case of fraud, and that all this title was made up in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme to defeat the pursuer's right under the trust-disposition, I see no trace whatever of fraud on the face of these proceedings. I think that everything was done by Alexander Thain in the most open way possible. There was no concealment. I think that the other trustees and everybody else concerned knew perfectly well the state of the title and the facts; and I agree with Lord Kinnear that we are entitled to conclude from the non-appearance of the pursuer in the witness-box that he knew as well as other people the true state of the facts in this matter. On the whole matter I concur with Lord Kinnear in thinking that the defender should be assoilzied.

LORD M'LAREN.—I had not intended to express any separate opinion in this case, because I concur in great part with the complete and lucid exposition of this case which has been given by Lord Kinnear; but after hearing his Lordship's opinion there is one point not affecting the result of the case, but one on which I think there is a slight divergence of view, and perhaps it is right I should state what that is.

In my view, I am not able altogether to disregard the element of prescription or assertion of prescriptive right on the part of the defender. The case arises in this way, if I may summarise so much of the facts as is necessary to bring out my view:—The defender, or rather the immediate author of the defender, was in a position to make up a title to this little property as heir-at-law, and he was also one of three trust disponees under a conveyance of the same property. He made up his title as heir-at-law, and in so doing he acted quite legally, but having made up that title he was, but for a plea of deathbed, under an obligation to give the benefit of this title to the trust—to grant a deed in implement of the trust which he had accepted. Now, he did not do that, for reasons which are probably quite satisfactory; but supposing that prescription had not run upon the title of heir-at-law which was made up by the defender here, then it appears to me the defender would have had no answer to the present action, because he would have been in the position of a person sued on the obligation which lies upon every heir to implement his ancestor's trust-deed, and, on the other hand, he would not have been in a position to reduce that deed ex capite lecti founding on his individual right, because it was quite settled in the law of Scotland completion of the bargain ought not to have any influence on the decision of the case.

No. 226. July 18, 1891. Cochrane v. Stevenson.

In all such cases the form of the question is of course whether the subject in dispute is or is not incorporated with the tenement; but it must be admitted that the law recognises certain qualifications of the rule that what is physically attached to a building becomes part of the heritable subject. By the custom of the country certain fittings are removable by an executor in a question with the heir, or by a vendor in a question with the purchaser of the buildings. I am not sure that where the right of removal depends on custom we can assume that the customary rights are the same in Scotland as in England. In Scotland we know that certain house-furnishings, such as window-blinds and cornices, gasfittings, chandeliers, mirrors, and grates (even when these are built into the fire-place) are removable. I rather think that in England grates are not considered to be removable fixtures; but this is a mere difference of detail. It seems to me that all such things as I have mentioned (and no doubt there are others ejusdem generis) are things which may be described as part of the furnishing of a house, which are not included in the notion of an unfurnished house as that is commonly understood. They are therefore considered to be attached to the walls temporarily for purposes of convenience or security, and not with the view of annexing them to the tenements. From the nature of the case the attachment of such things is generally slight, so that they can be removed with little damage to the heritable subject. But I do not think that the kind of attachment is material to the question of removability. A mirror or a picture, for example, is screwed to the wall, and is most easily removed; a carpet is secured by studs, which have to be displaced by the use of a hammer or chisel.

A gas-bracket has its pipe soldered to the supply-pipe, and has to be cut; if the thing be removable, the attachment, whatever that may be, has to be severed, leaving in most cases some trace of injury. Such slight injury is an inconvenience to which the heir or purchaser must submit as an unavoidable incident of the separation of what does not belong to him from the property which he has acquired by inheritance or purchase. If the article cannot be removed without doing appreciable damage to the structure, I should say that it is then in fact annexed to the tenement, because I think that the question in such cases is really one of fact, whether the attachment is such as amounts to an incorporation of the moveable subject with the tenement.

In the present case I should hesitate to say that the pictures are removable by custom, because the case is probably not of such frequent occurrence as to have fallen directly under the influence of a customary rule. But the customary rule whereby mirrors and ornamental furnishings are removable has, as I think, a very material bearing on this case, because, as your Lordship has pointed out, pictures painted on canvas are not in any true sense part of the structure of the house, and because the principle underlying the custom of removing domestic fixtures is, that things which are not part of the structure are removable notwithstanding their temporary attachment to the walls or floors provided they can be removed without material injury to the apartment. If they cannot be removed without causing structural damage they must be taken to be incorporated. Keeping this distinction in view I have formed a clear opinion that the portraits of Lord and Lady Wharton retain their moveable character.

It seems to me that questions of this kind are always and necessarily circum-

No. 226.

July 18, 1891.
Cochrane v. Stevenson.

stantial questions, and that no definite rule can be laid down as to what will amount in fact to an incorporation with or building into the heritable subject. Unless we are prepared to upset all the recognised social conventions on this subject, and to hold that nothing through which a nail has been driven can be claimed as a moveable, each case must be considered with reference to its special circumstances, regard being had to the nature of the thing attached, to the nature of the attachment, to the purposes of the attachment, and (in questions between seller and purchaser) the intention of the contracting parties. With respect to the picture of King Charles II., if it had been the only picture in question I should probably have held that it was incorporated with the tenement, because according to the evidence this picture is not fixed over the panelling of the room, but in a manner takes the place of a panel, there being nothing between it and the stone wall. But when it is considered that the three pictures, together with a mirror (which is admitted to be removable), are all fitted to panels in the same apartment, and that three of the four articles are in our judgment clearly the pursuer's property, I think that the distinction which I have mentioned in the case of the King's portrait is insufficient to place it in a class by itself. I think that the three pictures ought to be considered as a set or assemblage of things which are either inseparably united to the heritable subject or are merely attached to it temporarily for purposes of convenience; and looking at them collectively I agree with the Lord Ordinary and with your Lordships that these pictures retain their moveable character notwithstanding their attachment to the walls of the apartment, and that the conclusions of the action are well founded.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have come to the same conclusion. The only question which we have to consider appears to me to be whether the pictures in dispute are in fact a part of the lands of Hawkhead or not. There are no stipulations in the contract between the parties which would enable the seller upon the one hand to withhold any part of the lands from the purchaser, or the purchaser on the other hand to claim delivery of corporeal moveables which are separate from the land, or to claim a right to retain any such moveables which he may have found upon the land. The contract accordingly has been carried into effect by the execution and delivery of a conveyance in ordinary terms, and I do not understand that the defender has any fault to find with the terms of his conveyance. Therefore if the pictures form part of the subjects conveyed, they belong to the defender, and if they do not form part of these subjects, they remain the property of Lord Glasgow's representatives, to whom they belonged before the sale. The question, therefore, would appear to be a question of fact, whether the pictures form part of the lands of Hawkhead and of the houses and buildings thereon, because that is the subject which has been conveyed to the defender, and that depends entirely upon whether they have been so fastened to the houses of Hawkhead as to become an integral part of the houses.

Now, it appears to me that in considering that question we have not to take into account distinctions which may sometimes be of importance in regulating the conflicting interests of landlord and tenant or possibly of successive heirs of entail, because I think we must take the law as it has been laid down in the House of Lords in the case of Brand's Trustees, 3 R. (H. L.) 16, where the Lord Chancellor lays down the doctrine of law in this way. His Lordship says there are two

No. 226.

July 18, 1891.
Cochrane v. Stevenson.

general rules. One of them is the well-known rule that whatever is fixed to the freehold of the land becomes part of the freehold. The other is quite a different and separate one, that whatever has once become part of the freehold cannot be severed by a limited owner whether he be owner for life or owner for years. Then his Lordship goes on to say that to the first of these rules there is no exception whatever—whatever is fixed to the land is part of the land. Then he says that to the second there are various important exceptions, and all the questions as to the difference and distinctions between the rights of landlord and tenant and of successive owners which have been raised in this case appear to me, according to his Lordship's exposition of the law, to depend upon this second rule to which there is that exception—that under certain circumstances things that have been fixed may be removed. But it is very clear that these are considerations with which we have nothing to do, because they do not apply, and cannot apply, to a case between disponer and disponee. Lord Glasgow might of course have detached the pictures from the walls of the house before he effected the sale, but after the conclusion of the sale it is quite clear that he could do nothing; and therefore the question appears to me to be, as your Lordships have considered it to be, a mere question of fact—whether the pictures in dispute are so permanently fixed to the buildings and houses of Hawkhead as to make them an integral part of those houses. It is in accordance with all our authorities to say that in considering that question the method of attachment is not the only point to which attention should be directed, because it is common for articles in themselves removable to be temporarily attached to the walls of a house for use or ornament, or to the floors of a house, as in the case of things which might be nailed to the floor without being so permanently fixed as to become in consequence of their attachment integral parts of the house itself. But still the real question, as it seems to me, must always be, whether in fact the subject which is said to be moveable has been so permanently fixed as to become a part of the house, or whether the attachment is of such a kind as to make the subject, which in itself was moveable, easily removable or removable without injury to the subject itself or to the building. Now, upon that question of fact I entirely agree with what has been said by your Lordships, and therefore I think it quite unnecessary to dwell upon the grounds upon which it seems to me that these three pictures have not been made permanent parts of the building but are removable and are not carried by the conveyance.

In common with your Lordship it has seemed to me that the question with regard to the picture of King Charles II. is somewhat different from the question with regard to the portraits of Lord and Lady Wharton. I agree with what was said by Lord Adam, that if it had been proved that in order to remove that picture it was necessary to remove also the entire structure of the frame in which it is fixed, the question would have been one of much greater difficulty than it actually is; but I also agree with what his Lordship said, that the evidence shews that that is not necessary, but that the picture may be removed like the others for any purpose for which it is desirable to get it down either temporarily or permanently.

I therefore agree with your Lordships in the result at which you have arrived.

THE COURT adhered.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 227.

July 18, 1891.
Gilmour v. Caledonian Insurance Co.

ANDREW GILMOUR, Pursuer (Respondent).—Salvesen.
THE CALEDONIAN INSURANCE COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—M'Clure.

Arbitration—Arbiters not named—Insurance.—A policy of fire insurance provided, inter alia:—"Where the company does not claim to avoid its liability under the policy on the ground of fraud or non-fulfilment of any of the conditions herein set forth, but a difference at any time arises between the company and the insured as to the amount payable in respect of any alleged loss or damage by fire, every such difference, when and as the same arises, shall be referred to the arbitration of" persons to be chosen by the parties. Held that this clause imported more than a reference for valuation merely, and therefore, being a reference to arbiters unnamed, did not exclude action on the policy.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth Darling.

ON 21st April 1891 Andrew Gilmour, merchant, Blantyre, brought an action against the Caledonian Insurance Company, Edinburgh, on a policy of fire insurance taken by him with the company over certain buildings in Blantyre, which had been destroyed by fire in February 1891.

The company in defence pleaded;—(1) The present action is excluded by the clause of reference in the policy. (2) In any view, the action ought to be sisted, pending the decision of the pursuer's claim by arbitration in terms of the policy.

The clause founded on by the defenders was in these terms:—"Where the company does not claim to avoid its liability under the policy on the ground of fraud or non-fulfilment of any of the conditions hereinbefore set forth, but a difference at any time arises between the company and the insured, or any claimant under this policy, as to the amount payable in respect of any alleged loss or damage by fire, every such difference, when and as the same arises, shall be referred to the arbitration of one person to be chosen by both parties, or of two independent persons," who should choose an umpire. "And it is hereby expressly declared to be a condition of the making of this policy, and part of the contract between the company and the insured, that where the company does not claim to avoid its liability under the policy on the ground of fraud or non-fulfilment as aforesaid, the party insured or claimant shall not be entitled to commence or maintain any action at law or suit in equity on this policy till the amount due to the insured shall have been awarded as hereinbefore provided, and then only for the sum so awarded, and the obtaining of such award shall be a condition precedent to the commencement of any action or suit upon the policy."

On 23d June 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) repelled the first and second pleas in law for the defenders.*

---

* "OPINION.—This is an action on a fire insurance policy to recover the loss occasioned by a fire which took place last February. The parties are at issue as to the amount of the loss, the pursuer claiming £1700, which is the full sum in the policy, and the defenders refusing to pay more than £1350.

"What I have to dispose of now is the defence that the action is excluded by the clause of reference in the policy, or, if not excluded, that it ought to be sisted pending the decision of the pursuer's claim by arbitration. To this the pursuer replies that the clause is ineffectual because no arbiters are named.

"The clause is set out in answer 5. The substance of it is, that when a difference at any time arises between the company and the insured as to the amount payable in respect of any loss or damage by fire, there being no question of fraud or non-fulfilment of the conditions of the policy, such difference is to be referred to the arbitration of a person or persons to be chosen by the parties. Then there are provisions for working out the reference, and a declaration that the insured is not to be entitled to commence or maintain any action on the policy

No. 227.

July 18, 1891. Gilmour v. Caledonian Insurance Co.

The defenders reclaimed.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the holder of a fire policy has raised the present action against the insurance company to recover the amount of the loss occasioned by a fire which occurred in his premises in February 1891. The defence to the claim is that it is excluded by the terms of the clause of reference in the policy. The Lord Ordinary has repelled that plea. In so doing his Lordship has proceeded upon the well-known rule of the law of Scotland that an agreement to refer future disputes to unnamed arbiters is ineffectual, and has in consequence held that it does not fall within the equally well-known exception which his Lordship refers to in that part of his note in which, quoting from Bell on Arbitration, he observes that "there is an exception to the rule when the agreement to refer 'does not contemplate the decision of proper disputes between the parties, but the adjustment of some condition, or the liquidation of some obligation, contained in the contract of which the agreement to submit forms a part.'" Now, this rule and the exception to it are fixed by a series of decisions, and they are exemplified in the recent case of Tancred, Arrol, & Company in the House of Lords (17 R. (H. L.) 31).

The only question, therefore, which we have to determine is, whether the present case falls within the rule or within the exception, and that of course till the amount shall have been fixed by arbitration. Of course the efficacy of this last declaration must depend on whether there is an effectual agreement to refer.

"The general rule of the law of Scotland that an agreement to refer future disputes or differences to unnamed arbiters is ineffectual cannot at this time of day be called in question, and it received very recent recognition by the House of Lords in the case of Tancred, Arrol, & Company v. Steel Company of Scotland, 17 R. (H. L.) 31. There is an exception to the rule where the agreement to refer, to quote the words of Bell on Arbitration, p. 87, 'does not contemplate the decision of proper disputes between the parties, but the adjustment of some condition, or the liquidation of some obligation, contained in the contract of which the agreement to submit forms a part.' Examples of this exception are to be found in the common case of a landlord being bound in a lease to take the tenant's stock off his hands at valuation, or to pay a certain proportion of the value of buildings on the ground (as in the recent case of Lord Advocate v. Earl of Home, 18 R. 397), or of a mineral tenant being entitled to relinquish the lease when, in the opinion of skilled men mutually chosen, the minerals have become incapable of being worked to profit (as in Merry & Cuninghame v. Brown, 21 D. 1337). But these are all cases where the right, whether it be a right to receive money or to be rid of an obligation, is conferred by and made dependent on the very clause which binds the parties to nominate arbiters. There are also cases in which the fact to be ascertained, or the sum to be assessed by the arbiter is something quite subsidiary to the main purposes of the contract. In the present case the position is altogether different. The right to recover for damage by fire is the cardinal right conferred on the insured by the policy. It in no way depends on the agreement to refer; and the arbitration clause is simply an attempt to oust the jurisdiction of the Courts of law from every action which the insured could have any possible interest to raise, except in the single case where the insurance company has intimated a defence of fraud or non-fulfilment of the conditions of the policy.

"It seems to me, therefore, that this clause falls under the rule and not under the exception, and that it offers no obstacle to the action going on in the ordinary way."

[1] Merry & Cuninghame v. Brown, July 15, 1859, 21 D. 1337, 31 Scot. Jur. 733, affd. March 21, 1863, 1 Macph. (H. L.) 14, 35 Scot. Jur. 417; Ramsay v. Strain, Feb. 6, 1884, 11 R. 527; Tancred, Arrol, & Co. v. Steel Company of Scotland, March 7, 1890, 17 R. (H. L.) 31.

depends upon the terms of the clause of arbitration. The clause is in these terms:—"Where the company does not claim to avoid its liability under the policy on the ground of fraud or non-fulfilment of any of the conditions herein-before set forth, but a difference at any time arises between the company and the insured, or any claimant under this policy, as to the amount payable in respect of any alleged loss or damage by fire, every such difference, when and as the same arises, shall be referred to the arbitration" of persons to be chosen by the parties. Now, what does a claim of this kind comprehend? Is it a mere assessment of damages,—that is to say, a mere valuation of the loss sustained,—or is it an assessment in a wider sense? Now, questions of fact may arise as to whether articles alleged to be destroyed fall within the scope of the policy; or as to whether articles alleged to be destroyed were actually in the premises at the time; or as to the value of articles burnt, which could only be got at by an expert, or by someone who knew their intrinsic value. It appears to me, therefore, that this clause of reference is of the wider kind. If the value of the articles lost was disputed, I think that the language of this clause would admit inquiry, not merely as to the value of articles admittedly on the premises and within the policy, but also as to whether the articles in dispute were or were not in the building at the time of the fire, for there is no admission on that point and also as to whether they belong to the class of articles insured by the policy.

No. 227.

July 18, 1891.

Gilmour v. Caledonian Insurance Co.

I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that this clause of reference falls under the general rule which I have stated, and not under the exception.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have already expressed my opinion on clauses of this kind in the joint opinion of Lord Rutherfurd Clark and myself in the Second Division case of Ramsay v. Strain, 11 R. 527, and I have nothing further to add.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

THOMAS M'NAUGHT, S.S.C.—T. & R. B. RANKEN, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN ROBERTSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Shaw—Gunn.
THE LINLITHGOW OIL COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Comrie Thomson—Dickson.

No. 228.

July 18, 1891.*

Robertson v. Linlithgow Oil Co., Limited.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Relevancy at common law and under Employers Liability Act, 1880 (42 and 43 Vict. c. 42).—In an action of damages raised by a labourer against his employer at common law, and alternatively under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the pursuer alleged that he was in the course of his duty, at two o'clock on the morning of 27th March, uncoupling waggons filled with shale, which had been propelled by an engine along a line of railway belonging to the defenders, and that while he was between two of the waggons the engine-driver returned with the engine, and drove it suddenly, without warning, culpably and carelessly, against these waggons, by reason of which a waggon went over the pursuer's leg; that at the place where the accident happened there was a hole several feet deep and two feet wide under the railway lines, which ought to have been covered with planks, at least during the night, and that the pursuer, notwithstanding the want of warning, would probably have escaped but for said hole; that one of his feet slipped into it, and that he was thereby unable to get his other foot clear in time. Held that, as according to the pursuer's statement, it was the engine-driver's breach of duty that caused the

* Decided July 11, 1891.

No. 228.
July 18, 1891.
Robertson v. Linlithgow Oil Co., Limited.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. l.

accident at the particular place, there was no relevant case at common law against the defenders.

JOHN ROBERTSON, labourer, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, against the Linlithgow Oil Company, Limited, for damages for injuries received on 27th March 1891 by him, while in the defenders' employment, through their alleged fault. The action concluded for £1000 as damages at common law, and alternatively for £182 as damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 4) "The work to which defenders put pursuer when he entered their employment as a labourer was work in connection with the trigging or stopping and uncoupling of waggons, and the breaking or crushing of shale, and the emptying of waggons which brought shale from the mines to be broken or crushed, preparatory to the oil being extracted therefrom." (Cond. 5) "The defenders had railway lines laid down all through their said works, and they had railway lines laid down close beside the shale-breaking machinery, at or near which pursuer was instructed to work. On these railway lines trains of waggons were run, driven, or propelled by locomotive engines." (Cond. 6) "The shale-breaking or crushing machinery was constructed or situated below the level of the ground and between the rails of one of said railway lines. There were three such shale-breaking machines close beside each other, situated between said rails, which made the place specially dangerous for persons doing work near said rails. Anyone falling into said machines would be seriously injured. The object of said machines being placed between said rails was that waggons containing shale might be run on said railway lines to the breaking machinery, and the shale emptied therein from the waggons while they were standing on the railway lines." (Cond. 7) "The railway lines near said shale-breaking machinery were on an incline of about one in forty. According to the system in vogue in defenders' works, trains of waggons containing shale were propelled along said railway lines towards and over said shale-breaking machines, the engines being behind the train. Said trains of waggons were forced up said incline until they were beyond the shale-breaking machines. The waggons were then spragged, or blocks of wood or bricks placed before the wheels, so as to keep the waggons standing on said incline. This was done owing to some of the waggons not being furnished with brakes, and the brakes on others being broken, or twisted, or otherwise unfit for use. It was then the duty of men in the defenders' employment to go between each pair of waggons and to uncouple each waggon from the other, and to unloose the fastenings at one side of the ends of the waggons, so that the shale might be emptied therefrom into said breaking machines. It was necessary to unloose the fastenings at one side of the ends of the waggons, as the breaking machines were so situated that when the waggons were brought over the same for emptying only one side of the waggon could be reached. It was pursuer's duty to assist in the foregoing operations, as part of the work which the defenders instructed him to perform." (Cond. 8) "A short way up said incline, and a little beyond said shale-breaking machines, the defenders had made a trench or hole some feet deep, and about two feet broad across, and under said railway lines, for the purpose of laying some pipe, or for some other purpose to the pursuer unknown. Defenders culpably and carelessly allowed said trench or hole to remain there longer than was necessary, and it was there on said 27th March 1891, and its presence rendered said railway lines and the ways and works near the same defective and dangerous, which contributed materially to the occurrence of the accident, and the injuries to pursuer after mentioned. Said trench or hole ought to have been covered by planks, and other means taken to cover the same, at least during the night time. The defective condition of said ways and works arose from the negligence of the defenders or of their manager or foreman in their service entrusted with the duty of seeing that said ways and works were in proper condition." (Cond. 9) "On said 27th March 1891, and at or near said shale-breaking machines, there was no, or at least insufficient, light. Defenders had . . . culpably and carelessly failed to provide any, or at least sufficient light for the proper and safe discharge by pursuer and defenders' other workmen of the duties devolving upon them. This fault on defenders' part materially contributed to the accident after mentioned, and to the injuries sustained by pursuer."

(Cond. 10) "On 27th March 1891 pursuer was at his said work in defenders' employment. Pursuer was on the night-shift. Between two and three o'clock on the morning of said date a train of waggons containing shale was brought along said railway lines towards said breaking machines. An engine belonging to the defenders, called the 'Stag,' was behind said train propelling the same. The engine-driver was named William Martin, and the guard in charge of said train was named Thomas M'Parland. A number of waggons were forced over and beyond said breaking machine, and, according to custom, were then spragged or otherwise made stationary on said incline. The engine then left the spot, and pursuer, according to defenders' instructions, and his duty as shewn him by defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, proceeded to go between said waggons and to uncouple them from each other, and to unloose the fastenings at one side of the door at the ends of the waggons." (Cond. 11) "While pursuer was between two of said waggons, busily engaged at his said work, said engine-driver returned with said engine, having, it is believed, one or two waggons in front of it, which had no lamp or any light affixed to them, and drove suddenly, and without warning, culpably and carelessly, against the waggons, between two of which pursuer was engaged working. The said engine-driver culpably and carelessly failed to sound or blow the engine whistle or horn, as he ought to have done, when approaching said waggons and said shale-breaking machines, or to give any warning or intimation whatever. The said guard in charge of said waggons and trains also culpably and carelessly failed to warn the pursuer of the approach of said engine and waggons, and to take due precautions for his safety, while engaged in his duties foresaid, by preventing said engine and waggons from returning to the spot till pursuer was safe from danger." (Cond. 12) "Pursuer was in the act of coming out from between two of said waggons when said collision occurred, and he would, notwithstanding the want of warning and the danger he was placed in, have probably escaped any injuries but for said hole or trench. One of his feet slipped into it, and he was thereby unable to get the other clear in time, and a waggon went over one of his legs, close below the knee, and severed it from his body."

(Cond. 14) "The system adopted by defenders in bringing the shale to the breaking machines was dangerous and defective, and the position of the breaking machines, which were placed so as to suit said system, was unusual and dangerous. In particular, the habitual propelling of waggons with the engine in rear, in place of being in front drawing the waggons, is contrary to usage and the best practice. The forcing of waggons up an incline, and then spragging or wedging them by pieces of wood or brick, ought only to have been a temporary expedient, instead of being, as it was, the permanent and only method adopted. The railway ought to have been level at the spot selected for the storing of said waggons, and the waggons fitted with proper brakes. There ought to have been a lye, into which these waggons should have been shunted, and a gate placed at the entrance thereto, or a man appointed as guard thereof, so that no other waggons or engines could enter the same while men were working about the waggons in the lye. There were too few men habitually employed by defenders in connection with such operations, and there were too few men employed at the time of said accident, and the pursuer was too inexperienced to be employed by defenders in such dangerous work without special precautions being taken for his safety, which they failed to take." (Cond. 15) "The pursuer's said injuries were caused by the fault of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible. The defenders are liable for said injuries at common law owing to their fault (1) in adopting the dangerous and defective system of working before condescended on; (2) in not providing sufficient light for the carrying on safely of said operations during the night-shifts; (3) in causing such work to be done during night-shifts in place of confining it to the daytime; (4) in habitually employing too few men to do such work safely; and (5) from the defective condition of their said ways and works. The defenders are also liable for said injuries under the Employers Liability Act, owing (1) to the defective condition of their said ways and works; (2) by reason of the negligence of the said engine-driver who had charge or control of said locomotive-engine; (3) by reason of the negligence of the said guard who had charge or control of said trains or waggons upon said railway; and (4) by reason of the negligence of defenders' foreman or other person in defenders' service, to whose said orders or directions the pursuer at the time of said injury was bound to conform, and did conform, said injury resulting from his having so conformed."

No. 228.

July 18, 1891. Robertson v. Linlithgow Oil Co., Limited.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having been injured as condescended on, by and through the fault of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, the defenders are liable to the pursuer in the loss, injury, and damage he has thereby sustained. (3) Alternatively, the pursuer having been injured while in the employment of the defenders as a workman, through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the alternative conclusion of the petition, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant in so far as the action is based on common law.

On 17th July 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) allowed a proof before answer. The pursuer appealed for jury trial to the Court of Session.

The defenders, while admitting that the action was relevant under the Employers Liability Act, argued that it was irrelevant as far as laid at common law.

Argued for the pursuer;—The action was relevant at common law. That followed from the case of Murdoch v. MacKinnon,[1] which shewed that employers were responsible for accidents caused to their workmen through a defective system of working.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Upon this case I have come to be of opinion that no relevant facts are averred by the pursuer entitling him to an issue at common law, and that the action, if it had been raised prior to the Employers Liability Act of 1880, would have been dismissed as irrelevant. In the record there are [1] Murdoch v. MacKinnon, March 7, 1885, 12 R. 810.

No. 228.

July 18, 1891. Robertson v. Linlithgow Oil Co., Limited.

a large number of averments, which are brought to a head in condescendence 15, but no case at common law is made out at all. Two statements might have been amplified upon which a case at common law might have been founded. Thus there is a statement about the light which is said to have been defective, but there is no averment as to how the absence of light contributed to the accident. Again, it is alleged that there was an uncovered hole at the place where the accident happened, and it is said that the pursuer's foot slipped into this hole when the engine struck the waggons, and that if there had been no hole there the pursuer might have escaped.

But the case of the pursuer is that the engine should never have been brought into contact with the waggons at all. If so, it is not easy to see how there being defective light or an uncovered hole has anything to do with the accident, which is alleged to have been caused by the engine-driver acting in breach of his duty. The defenders cannot be held in fault for the want of light or the presence of a hole, if neither of these could have caused the accident unless some breach of duty were committed by one of their servants. They were not called upon to provide against such breach of duty. I think therefore that there is no case at common law.

The pursuer may, however, have an action under the Employers Liability Act, as in terms of the provisions of that Act an employer is made liable for the faults committed by the person in charge of a locomotive-engine.

He has two conclusions, one for £1000 at common law, and another for £182 under the statute. I think we should dismiss as irrelevant the action as far as laid at common law, and allow an issue in the action as far as brought under the Employers Liability Act.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the action is irrelevant so far as laid at common law, and dismiss the same so far as regards the first conclusion of the summons: Approve of the issue so far as founded on the Employers Liability Act as the issue for the trial of the cause, and decern, reserving all questions of expenses," &c.

ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 229.

July 18, 1891.* Robertson v. British Linen Co.

JAMES ALEXANDER ROBERTSON (Liquidator of the International Exhibition Association of Electrical Engineering and Inventions, 1890), Petitioner.—Murray—A. S. D. Thomson.

THE BRITISH LINEN COMPANY, Respondents.—Comrie Thomson—C. J. Guthrie.

Company—Limited by guarantee—Right in security—Pledge—Power to hypothecate guarantee letters in security of advances—Ultra vires—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 9.—In the memorandum and articles of association of a company registered under the Companies Act, 1862, as a company limited by guarantee and empowered to create a guarantee fund, the subscribers to which were in the event of a winding-up, and there being a deficiency of assets, to contribute to the assets of the company to the extent of their guarantee, it was provided that the company might borrow money, and, in security thereof, assign or hypothecate to the lender the guarantee obligations, letters, and relative documents from subscribers to the guarantee fund. The executive council having borrowed a sum of money from a bank in terms of the above provisions, hypothecated the letters of guarantee to the bank in security of the advance.

* Decided Dec. 12, 1890.

No. 229.

July 18, 1891. Robertson v. British Linen Co.

In a voluntary liquidation, under supervision of the Court, the liquidator presented a note praying the Court to ordain the bank to deliver the letters to him, and to declare that the bank had no valid security or preference over the guarantee fund or letters of guarantee for payment of their advances.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) granted the prayer of the petition, holding (1) that as the guarantee fund had no existence until the company went into liquidation, and then only in the event of there being a deficiency of assets, and for the purpose of equal distribution among the creditors, it was ultra vires of the executive council to create a security over it in favour of any particular creditor; and (2) that in any view the hypothecation or pledge of the letters was ineffectual to constitute a preference over the fund in competition with the liquidator, who was entitled to possession of the letters as accessories of the fund.

Outer-House Ld. Stormonth Darling, Ordinary.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION ASSOCIATION OF ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING AND INVENTIONS, 1890, was upon 13th December 1889 incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, as a company by guarantee (section 9 of the Act of 1862), and by licence of the Board of Trade under section 23 of the Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 131), it was registered with a limited liability, but without the word "limited" added to its name.

By the memorandum of association, section 3, the objects for which the association was established were stated, inter alia, to be:— . . . "(E) To sell, assign, convey, or otherwise dispose of, or deal with the whole property and effects of the association. . . . (G) To borrow money upon bonds, bills, promissory-notes, or other obligations or securities of the association, or in such other manner as the association shall think fit, and to execute and grant cash-credit or other bonds, and make, accept, indorse, and execute promissory-notes, bills of exchange, or other negotiable instruments, and in particular, to hypothecate or assign to any corporation or person who shall lend money to the association, the guarantee obligations, letters, and relative documents from corporations, firms, or persons, who shall have agreed, or shall hereafter agree, to become members of the association, or shall have become, or shall hereafter become, subscribers to the guarantee fund of the said Exhibition. . . ."

Section 7 of the memorandum provided that every member of the company should be liable, in the event of the same being wound up during the time that he was a member, to contribute to the assets of the company for the payment of its debts such an amount as might be required, not exceeding £1.

Section 37 provided (1) that "in the event of a loss or deficiency arising," the same should be assessed first upon the subscribers to the guarantee fund (whether members of the association or not), and when that fund was exhausted, upon the members in respect of their liability under clause 7 of the memorandum; (2) that the subscribers to the guarantee fund (whether members or not) should be liable to the amount of their respective subscriptions, but no further, for any resulting loss arising from other subscribers (whether members or not) failing to pay their proportioned shares of the loss or deficiency in whole or in part; (3) that in addition to the guarantee provided by the 7th article of the memorandum every member subscribing to the guarantee fund should undertake to contribute to the assets of the association, in the event of the same being wound up, such amount as might be required, not exceeding the amount of his subscription.

By sections 28, 29, and 30 of the articles, the powers and duties of certain persons constituted by section 25 as the executive council of the association, were defined, section 30 more particularly providing that the executive council should be trusted with, and might exercise and perform, all or any of the following powers and duties, viz.:—"(6) To borrow any sum or sums of money, not exceeding in cumulo the amount of the guarantee fund, for the purposes of the association, and that either on cash-credit or otherwise, and to assign and hypothecate on security thereof all or any part of the property and effects of the association, and in particular, the guarantee obligations, letters, and relative documents, from corporations, firms, or persons who shall have agreed, or shall hereafter agree, to become members of the association, or shall have become, or shall hereafter become, subscribers to the guarantee fund of the Exhibition."

In accordance with the aforesaid provisions a number of corporations, firms, and persons agreed to become members of the association, authorising the secretary, by printed form duly filled in by them, to place their names on the list of subscribers to the guarantee fund.

In the end of 1889 the executive applied to the British Linen Company for an overdraft, and the bank ultimately agreed to give the advances on condition that the executive council should assign and hypothecate to them the guarantee obligations in terms and under the powers of the memorandum and articles of association.

At a meeting of the council of the association held on 10th January 1890 a resolution was passed by which the council hypothecated to the bank the letters of guarantee granted by the subscribers to the guarantee fund, and undertook that all necessary proceedings should be taken at their instance to recover the sums for which the several guarantors were respectively liable under the letters, and to apply the same in reduction of the advances. There was also an undertaking to assign to the bank when called upon the whole pecuniary rights and benefits to which the council were entitled under certain contracts about to be entered into. The secretary was also authorised to deliver to the bank the letters of guarantee.

In conformity with this minute the whole letters of guarantee were delivered by the council to the bank, and a circular was upon 24th October 1890 sent by the law-agents of the bank to each of the guarantors, intimating that the executive council, "as empowered by the articles of association, have hypothecated to the bank in security of advances the letters of guarantee," and further stating,—"You will please take notice that your letter of guarantee is now in the hands of the bank, and that in the event of there being any call upon you under your guarantee, the amount of such call will fall to be paid to the bank."

The company went into voluntary liquidation on 5th November 1890, and on 7th November the liquidator presented a petition to the Court to have the liquidation placed under supervision of the Court.

On 10th November the liquidator applied to the bank for delivery of the letters of guarantee that the sums due under them might be collected, under reservation of all questions as to the bank's right to the guarantee fund, but the bank refused to part with them "except on payment of the amount of their advances."

On 13th November the Court pronounced an order directing the voluntary winding-up of the association to be continued subject to the supervision of the Court.

On 22d November the liquidator presented a note under the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862, in which he prayed the Court to ordain the bank to deliver forthwith into his hands "all the said letters of guarantee, so far as in their possession, or held by anyone on their behalf, and thereafter to find and declare that the said [British Linen]

No. 229.

July 18, 1891. Robertson v. British Linen Co.

company have no valid security or preference over the said guarantee fund for repayment of their said advances."

The amount advanced by the bank was £18,312, 6s. 4d., exclusive of interest.

In the note the liquidator denied that the bank had obtained a valid security over the letters of guarantee or the guarantee fund, and he contended that the liability undertaken by the members of the association by way of guarantee to contribute to the liabilities of the association was sua natura not assignable, et separatim, was not assigned to the bank, and further, that the so-called hypothecation of the ipsa corpora of the letters of guarantee could and did create no right or security whatever.

On 25th November the bank lodged answers, in which they maintained that under the minute dated January 1890, and the proceedings following thereon, the guarantee obligations were validly hypothecated and assigned to them, and that they thereupon became vested in the sole right and title to the sums contained in the obligation. Further, that the only right of the liquidator in the obligation was to receive payment from the bank of any balance which might remain over of the sums received by them after satisfying the amount of the advances made by them to the council, and interest thereon.

On 5th December the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having reported the note and answers to the Second Division of the Court, when the parties were heard, ordains the British Linen Company to deliver forthwith into the hands of the liquidator all the letters of guarantee referred to in the said note so far as in their possession or held by anyone on their behalf, under reservation of all questions of preference and security over the said guarantee fund and letters, and under the special declaration that any such question shall be decided as if the said British Linen Company had remained in possession of the said letters, and decerns."

On 12th December the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that the British Linen Company have no valid security or preference over the guarantee fund or letters of guarantee mentioned in the said note for repayment of the advances made by the said British Linen Company also mentioned in the said note: Finds the liquidator entitled to possession of the said letters of guarantee, and decerns: Finds the said British Linen Company liable in expenses to the liquidator."*

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—Agents.

* "OPINION.—The preliminary question as to delivery of the letters of guarantee having been disposed of, without prejudice to the pleas of parties, I have now to decide whether the British Linen Company have any valid security or preference over the guarantee fund or the letters for repayment of their advances. In my opinion they have not.

"It is necessary, in the first place, to attend to the nature of the association or company with which we are dealing. It was 'a company limited by guarantee' in the sense of section 9 of the Companies Act, 1862. Accordingly, the memorandum of association contained a declaration (art. 7) that 'Every member of the association undertakes to contribute to the assets of the association in the event of the same being wound up during the time that he is a member, or within one year afterwards, for payment of the debts and liabilities of the association contracted before the time at which he ceases to be a member, and of the costs, charges, and the expenses of winding-up the same, and for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves, such amount as may be required not exceeding one pound, or in case of his liability becoming unlimited, such other amount as may be required in pursuance of the last preceding paragraph of this memorandum.'

No. 229.

July 18, 1891.

Robertson v. British Linen Co.

"By article 10 there was a further provision to the effect that the limitation of liability under article 7 should not affect the liability, if any, of any member of the association who might subscribe to the guarantee fund of the association, or authorise his name to be placed on the list of subscribers thereto, under clause 37 of the articles of association, to the extent of his subscription to the guarantee fund. And by clause 37 of the articles of association there was a 'provision for loss or deficiency' the effect of which was (a) that persons might subscribe to the guarantee fund without becoming members of the association; (b) that any loss or deficiency should be assessed first upon the subscribers to the guarantee fund (whether members or not) and then upon the members in respect of their liability under article 7; (c) that the subscribers to the guarantee fund (whether members or not) should be liable to the amount of their respective subscriptions, but no further, for any resulting loss arising from other subscribers (whether members or not) failing to pay their proportioned shares of the loss or deficiency in whole or in part; and (d) that, in addition to the guarantee provided by the 7th paragraph of the memorandum of association every member subscribing to the guarantee fund undertook to contribute to the assets of the association, in the event of the same being wound up, such amount as may be required not exceeding the amount of his subscription.

"Under the Companies Acts a company limited by guarantee may, or may not, have its capital divided into shares. This company had no share capital. It was not formed for purposes of gain, there being a provision in the memorandum that no part of its income or property should be paid, directly or indirectly, by way of profit to its members, and accordingly it was, by licence of the Board of Trade, under sec. 23 of the Companies Act, 1867, registered with limited liability, but without the addition of the word 'limited' to its name.

"It will thus be seen that it had to start with no capital or property whatever. It had the prospect of a very considerable income from various sources, but so far as its members and subscribers were concerned, it had no claim upon them except an obligation to contribute, within the limit of their subscriptions, such sums as might be required in the event of a winding-up.

"Very shortly after its formation the association required an advance of money from the bank, and the executive council (which corresponded to the board of directors in an ordinary company), on 10th January 1890, passed a resolution which is set out in the note. By this resolution the council hypothecated to the bank the letters of guarantee granted by the subscribers to the guarantee fund, and undertook that all necessary proceedings should be taken at their instance to recover the sums for which the several guarantors were respectively liable under the letters, and to apply the same in reduction of the advances. There was also an undertaking to assign to the bank, when called upon, the whole pecuniary rights and benefits to which the council were entitled under certain contracts about to be entered into. Further, the secretary was authorised to deliver to the bank the letters of guarantee, and this was afterwards done.

"Whatever may be the legal effect of this transaction, it was undoubtedly in accordance with the memorandum and articles of association. By the memorandum (3 G) one of the objects of the association was declared to be (after a general power of borrowing money and executing cash-credit or other bonds, bills, promissory-notes, and so forth) 'in particular to hypothecate or assign to any corporation or person who shall lend money to the association the guarantee obligations, letters, and relative documents,' from members and subscribers to the guarantee fund. By the articles [30 (6)] the executive council were empowered 'to borrow any sum or sums of money, not exceeding in cumulo the amount of the guarantee fund, for the purposes of the association, and that either on cash-credit or otherwise, and to assign and hypothecate in security thereof all or any part of the property and effects of the association, and in particular the guarantee obligations, letters, and relative documents from corporations, firms, or persons who shall have agreed, or shall hereafter agree, to become members of the association, or shall have become, or shall hereafter become, subscribers to the guarantee fund of the exhibition.'

"The first question which arises is, whether the power so conferred and exer-

No. 229.

July 18, 1891.
Robertson v. British Linen Co.

cised is consistent with the general scope and tenor of the Companies Acts? Of course neither the memorandum nor the articles of association can confer power upon directors to do anything contrary to the statutes by which limited liability is allowed. Of this there are two very recent illustrations in Scotland (Klenck v. East India Co. for Exploration and Mining, Limited, Dec. 21, 1888, 16 R. 271, and General Property Investment Company and Liquidator v. Matheson's Trustees, Dec. 21, 1888, 16 R. 282) where it was held ultra vires of a company in the one case to issue its shares at a discount, and in the other to purchase its own shares, although there was power to that effect in the memorandum and articles. These cases were decided in conformity with Trevor v. Whitworth in the House of Lords (1887, 12 L. R. App. Cas. 409), which was also a case of a company purchasing its own shares, and the ratio decidendi in all of them was, not that there was any express prohibition in the Companies Acts against the things done, but that under the statutes the creditors of the company were entitled to rely on the preservation of the capital, both called and uncalled, for their behoof, except in so far as it was diminished by the operations of the company in pursuit of its lawful business. In the one case (of the company buying its own shares) this principle was infringed by what was practically a return of a portion of the paid-up capital to the shareholder who sold, and in the other case (of the company issuing its shares at a discount) by what was practically a discharge of a portion of the unpaid capital which ex facie of the share the shareholder was bound to pay.—(See opinion of the Lord President at p. 277 of 16 R.)

"Now, these were all cases of companies limited by shares, where of course the directors have a power of making calls while the company is still in operation. The peculiarity here is that the guarantee fund is an asset which can only be called up when the company is in liquidation, and then only if there happens to be a deficiency. The intention of the Act of 1862, as expressed in section 133, is, that in a winding-up 'the property of the company shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu.' The knowledge that such an asset exists in spe may be, and no doubt is, a source of credit to the company while it is in operation, but that is a very different thing from holding that a contingent fund of this sort, intended for the purpose of meeting its liabilities in the event of a winding-up, and never under the control of the directors while it is a going concern, can be anticipated by them in favour of a particular creditor for the purpose of meeting its immediate necessities.

"This question was fully discussed in the recent English case In re Py'-Works, 1890, L. R. 44 Ch. Div. 534. The company there was one limited by shares, and the directors had exercised a power contained in the articles to 'borrow on mortgage of all or any part of the property of the company,' and to include in any such mortgage 'all or any definite proportion of the capital of the company then uncalled.' It was held by the Court of Appeal that the calls to be made by the liquidator in the winding-up were bound by the mortgages, and that the several mortgagees were entitled to have the calls applied in payment of their mortgage debts in priority to the general creditors. But the judgment was expressly put on the ground that it was impossible to draw a distinction between calls made in fact by the directors and calls made in fact by the liquidator, and that the latter were as much part of the assets or capital of the company as the former. In this respect the learned Judges distinguished the case of a company limited by shares from the case of a company limited by guarantee. Lord Justice Cotton said (p. 574)—'We are considering the case of a call made in the winding-up of a limited company, not of a company limited by a guarantee, nor of an unlimited company. In the case of an unlimited or of a guarantee company, what can be called for in the winding-up may not be, and I think is not, considered as part of the capital of the company.' Similarly Lord Justice Lindley (p. 584) said—'Those moneys which are payable only on a winding-up, and which by the Act are excluded from the capital of the company, are never under the control of the directors, and cannot, I apprehend, be dealt with in any way by them. Those moneys form a statutory fund which only comes into existence when the company is in liquidation—that is to say, when the powers of the directors have ceased.' And later on he illustrated his meaning by reference to those banks and other unlimited companies which were allowed by the Companies Act, 1879, to register as limited by declaring that a portion of their capital should not be called up except in the event and for the purposes of the company being wound up. He said 'The Companies Act, 1879, sec. 5, enables a limited company to divide capital into two parts, one of which shall only be called up in the event of a winding-up. When the capital of the company has been so divided, that part which can only be called up in the event of a winding up ceases to be subject to the control of the directors, and cannot, I apprehend, be charged or disposed of by them.' Now, the case of a guarantee fund seems to me a fortiori of the case of a company under the Act of 1879, for while there might be some plausibility in holding that the uncalled capital of the latter was capital of the company from the beginning, I do not see any reason for treating a guarantee fund as capital until the commencement of the winding-up.

No. 229.
July 18, 1891.
Robertson v. British Linen Co.

"If this be so, there is a manifest repugnancy in article 30 (6) which first authorises the executive council to assign and hypothecate 'all or any part of the property and effects of the association,' and then goes on to specify in particular 'the guarantee obligations' which ex hypothesi are not part of such property or effects so long as it is a going concern. At all events, it seems to me that whether they be regarded as the property of the association prior to liquidation or not, they are appropriated by the statute for the satisfaction of the company's liabilities pari passu, and are therefore not capable of being used for the purpose of giving a preference to any particular creditor.

"Even, however, if I am wrong on this point, the question remains, whether the minute of 10th January 1890, gave the bank a valid preference as regards the guarantee letters over the general body of creditors.

"The respondents maintain that the effect of the minute was to give them an assignation to the debts contained in the letters, and that they duly intimated the assignation by the circular of their law-agents issued to the guarantors on 24th October 1890. I cannot so construe the minute. It seems to me, that having the choice under the memorandum and articles of assignation or hypothecation, the executive council deliberately selected the latter, and that the undertaking to use all necessary proceedings at their own instance for recovery of the sums guaranteed was consistent with hypothecation and inconsistent with assignation.

"To meet this alternative the respondents say, that although they may have no claim to the debts contained in the letters, and consequently no right to recover directly from the debtors, they still have a good hypothecation, and consequently a right to retain possession of the letters till their claim is paid in full. Whatever might have been their rights in a question with the executive council, who possibly might have been barred from pleading that the hypothecation was ineffectual, it by no means follows that the liquidator is under any such disability. Not only is it his duty to ingather and distribute the estate for behoof of the general body of creditors, but his position since the Companies Act of 1886 is very much assimilated to that of a trustee in bankruptcy. A winding-up by or under the supervision of the Court is now, by section 3 of that Act, equivalent, inter alia, to an arrestment in execution and decree of furthcoming, and the question therefore is, whether the pledgee of documents like these, having no title to the debts which they instruct, can successfully maintain a preference over a creditor who has used the appropriate diligence in the hands of the debtors and followed it up by a decree of furthcoming. In considering this question it is of no moment to say that the constitution of the company permitted such hypothecation, for the memorandum and articles in the present case can no more validate a security which is bad at common law than the special resolution of the company in Clark, &c. v. West Calder Oil Co., &c., June 30, 1882, 9 R. 1017, could make good an assignation of leases and moveables on which no possession had followed.

"It is contended by the liquidator that the proper subjects of pledge are corporeal moveables, and that documents of debt cannot be effectually pledged (at all events in competition with anyone having a title to the debt itself) except where the debt is inseparable from the document, as in bills, or bonds payable to bearer. His main authority for this contention is the case of Christie v. Ruxton, June 27, 1862, 34 Scot. Jur. 568, 24 D. 1182, which related to the title-deeds of an estate pledged for an advance of money, but the case was decided on the broad ground stated by Lord Benholme (and concurred in by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis) that, 'by our law it is incompetent to impignorate title-deeds or mere documents of debt, so as to give a title of possession of these moveable subjects capable of competing with right to vindicate their possession competent to the proprietor of the estate or the creditor in the bond who has acquired right to the estate or to the debt by singular and onerous title from the impignorator.' His Lordship quotes a passage from Baron Hume's Lectures which fully sustains the general principle, and supplies an illustration exactly meeting the present case, for, after asserting the preference of an assignee to a bond who has intimated his assignation but has never possessed the bond over one who has got delivery of the bond but has not intimated, Baron Hume adds, 'In the same way he who duly arrests has right to the document of debt arrested, wherever that document may be.' If that be the law of Scotland, as I believe it is, the liquidator is in the position of having 'duly arrested,' and is therefore preferable to the mere pledgee of the document.

No. 229.

July 18, 1891. Robertson v. British Linen Co.

"It was urged for the respondents that Mr Bell in his Commentaries had adopted a different view. But whatever may be said of some observations about the deposit of title-deeds, it is plain that he agrees with Baron Hume as to documents of debt, for at p. 24 of vol. ii. (Lord M'Laren's edition) he says, —'It seems in the same way inconsistent with the true principles of law to sanction a burden on the real right even to moveables or debts, without an act of permanent or temporary transference of the right itself, unless in the case already mentioned of the debts and vouchers being inseparable.' And,—'It is not necessary, in order to transfer a debt, that the instrument or bond should be delivered to the assignee, but the debt itself may be attached by arrestment in whose hands soever the bond may happen to be, so that the possession of the document gives no apparent property.' And the paragraph concludes with the general statement,—'The pledge of the document cannot therefore be the regular way of constituting a security over such a subject.'

"Two recent cases were cited by the respondents—Meikle and Wilson v. Pollard, Nov. 6, 1880, 8 R. 69, and Robertson v. Ross, Nov. 17, 1887, 15 R. 67, which were said to recognise a pledge of books and papers as effectual to the full extent here contended for. But I do not read these cases as inconsistent with the general principle laid down by Baron Hume and Mr Bell. In both cases the question arose with trustees under voluntary deeds—a not unimportant distinction—and in both, the right to retain the documents was claimed, in the one case by an accountant, and in the other by a factor, merely until they were paid for the work in connection with which the documents had been delivered to them. In neither case therefore was there any question of the validity of a pledge in security for money lent of documents of debt where a right to the debt itself had been acquired by arrestment. Indeed, the cases were treated as falling under the same principle as the right of an artificer to retain possession of an article entrusted to him for repair until payment of his account.

"I need hardly add that the respondents rest their case on the express contract contained in the minute of January 10th, and not on the right of retention known as bankers' lien. The latter would not avail them, for it extends merely to 'unappropriated negotiable instruments belonging to the customer in the hands of the banker'—Horsbrugh v. Royal Bank, October 24, 1890, 28 S. L. R. 35, per Lord President, 39, 18 R. 12, Lord President, 16.

"I therefore come to the conclusion (1) that it was ultra vires of the executive council to create a security over the guarantee fund in favour of a particular creditor, and (2) that in any view the hypothecation or pledge of the letters was ineffectual to constitute a preference over the fund in competition with the liquidator, who is entitled to possession of the letters as accessories of the fund. All that I require to do is to find and declare that the respondents have no valid security or preference over the guarantee fund or the letters of guarantee for repayment of the advances mentioned in the petition."

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN VOLUME XVIII.

Cases decided in the House of Lords are printed in Italics.
Cases decided in the Court of Justiciary will be found under the head JUSTICIARY CASES.

ACQUIESCENCE. See Mines and Minerals, 1—Reparation, 10.

ADJUDICATION. Title to sue and defend—Jus tertii—Discharge—Statute 1621, cap. 6.

The debtor in an obligation for payment of an annuity has no title to plead, in answer to a demand for payment by a person who has adjudged the creditor's right, that the adjudger's right has been extinguished by payment of the debt on which the adjudication proceeded. Macleod's Trustees v. Murray, May 21, 1891, p. 830.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. Justice of Peace—Licensing Court—9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 13.

1. Held that a Justice of the Peace was not disqualified from sitting on the bench of Justices for the granting of licences under the 13th section of the above Act, by reason of the fact that he was trustee upon a sequestrated estate, part of which consisted of a public-house business. Lundie v. Magistrates of Falkirk, Oct. 31, 1890, p. 60.

Second trial where conviction on first trial "null and void"—Public-house—7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53, sec. 68.

2. A person was convicted before two Justices of retailing spirits without having a licence. One of the Justices was a person employed in the collection of certain duties of excise, and the proceedings were therefore declared by sec. 68 of the above Act to be utterly null and void to all intents and purposes. On the attention of the prosecutor being called to this fact he repaid the penalty which had been imposed in respect of the conviction. A new complaint for the same offence was brought, and a conviction again followed, in spite of a plea that this second proceeding was incompetent. An appeal having been taken to the Quarter Sessions against the second conviction, a case was stated for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer. Held that a decree by a competent Court was necessary to declare the statutory nullity, that the Justices had no jurisdiction to pronounce any such decree, were not at liberty to disregard the fact of a conviction having been already obtained for the same offence, and therefore could not entertain the second complaint. M'Intosh v. Waite, Feb. 27, 1891, p. 582.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. Title to sue—Foreign principal.

1. When a person enters into a contract in his own name for an undisclosed principal, the latter, on disclosing himself as principal, has a title to sue upon the contract, but is subject to all pleas which the defender could have maintained against the agent if the latter had raised the action. Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co., June 19, 1891, p. 975.
2. Although there may be a general usage in the foreign trade which raises a presumption that a British commission-merchant contracts as a principal and not as agent for a foreign trader, the presumption will give way to

BANK—Continued.

to extend the credit by £1000 on receiving an additional obligation from two of the obligants. Held (1) (following Reddie v. Williamson, 1 Macph. 228) that the bank by debiting the account with the year's interest in each year extinguished the claim for that interest, and converted it into an advance of principal; and therefore (2) that the personal obligants were only liable under the cash-credit obligations for the £1500 and £1000 of principal, with interest thereon from 31st October 1887, the date of the last balance, and that a voluntary liquidation of the company had not the effect of closing the account. Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees, Jan. 31, 1891, p. 476.

Stock Exchange—Fraud.

3. A stockbroker, whose bank account was overdrawn, paid into it a sum of money by endorsing a cheque received by him from another broker, to whom he had sold certain shares, on instructions from a body of trustees to sell and invest the price on deposit with certain colonial banks. The ordinary course of business on the Stock Exchange is that the selling broker receives the buying broker's cheque, and makes payment to his own customer by his own cheque, or, where he has instructions to re-invest, by delivery of the new investments. The sum paid by the broker into his account did not extinguish the overdraft. The broker made no re-investment for the trustees, and within a few days absconded without having further operated on his bank account to any substantial extent. The trustees sued the bank for the sum paid in. The bank officials deponed that they believed the money to have come into the broker's hands in the course of his business as a broker. Held that the bank was not liable to the trustees. Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, March 19, 1891, p. 751.

See Bill of Exchange, 4.

BANKRUPTCY. Notour Bankruptcy—Diligence—Poinding—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 7, 9, 12—Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 6.

1. Section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which equalises arrestments and poindings used within sixty days prior to, or four months subsequent to "the constitution of notour bankruptcy," contemplates the original constitution of notour bankruptcy only; and subsequent proceedings, which would of themselves have constituted notour bankruptcy, do not form a new constitution of notour bankruptcy to the effect of equalising diligence, notwithstanding the proviso of section 9 of the Act. Wood v. Cranston & Elliot, Jan. 13, 1891, p. 382.

Sequestration—Contingent Debt—Claim for expenses in litigation—Decree for interim execution pending appeal—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 14.

2. Held that a claim for the expenses of a Court of Session action for which the successful party had obtained decree for interim execution pending an appeal by his opponent to the House of Lords, was a "contingent" debt, and could not therefore support a petition for sequestration under the above enactment. Forbes v. Whyte, Nov. 29, 1890, p. 182.

Sequestration — Discharge — Appeal — Competency — Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 170.

3. In a petition in the Sheriff Court by a bankrupt for discharge, the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor of 1st October 1890, found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge and appointed him to make a declaration in terms of the statute. Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor of 10th October, found the declaration made by the bankrupt satisfactory, and discharged him. On 15th October an objecting creditor appealed under the 170th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856. Held that although the appeal was competent as an appeal against the interlocutor of 10th October, it did not also submit to review the prior interlocutor of 1st October, which was a substantive judgment, and had become final as not having been appealed against within the period prescribed by the Act. Alison v. Robertson's Trustees, Dec. 9, 1890, p. 212.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Sequestration—Discharge—Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 6.

4. In a petition by a bankrupt for discharge, the Sheriff, after consideration of a report by the trustee that the bankruptcy had arisen from innocent misfortune, pronounced an interlocutor finding the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, and appointed him to make a declaration in terms of the statute. Thereafter the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor in which he found the declaration satisfactory, and discharged the bankrupt. An objecting creditor appealed, under sec. 170 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, against this interlocutor, and stated that it contained no finding by the Sheriff that he had in terms of section 6 of the Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881, satisfied himself that the bankrupt's failure to pay a dividend of 5s. in the pound had arisen from circumstances for which he could not justly be held responsible. The Court refused the appeal, holding (1) that it was entirely within the Sheriff's discretion whether he should require the additional evidence on the question prescribed by subsection 2 of the 6th section of the Act; (2) that he might require such evidence at any time before actually discharging the bankrupt; and (3) that he must be assumed to have satisfied himself as to the facts referred to in the section before he granted the discharge. Alison v. Robertson's Trustees, Dec. 9, 1890, p. 212.

Preference—Compensation—Reduction—Title to sue—Act 1696, c. 5—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 10 and 11.

5. The Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 10 and 11, does not deprive an individual creditor of his title to reduce illegal preferences under the Act 1696, cap. 5, alleged to have been granted to his prejudice. Brown & Co. v. M'Callum, Dec. 19, 1890, p. 311.

Preference—Arrestment—Consignation—Act 1696, c. 5.

6. A pursuer used arrestments on the dependence of an action. Subsequently by arrangement between him and the defender, who denied liability, the latter consigned a sum in the hands of the Clerk of Court. The defender was sequestrated within sixty days of the arrestment, and thereafter the pursuer obtained decree in the action, in respect of the trustee not having sisted himself as a defender, and the bankrupt having failed to find caution. In a competition for the consigned fund, between the bankrupt's trustee and the pursuer, held that the pursuer was entitled to the fund, on the ground that the effect of the consignation was to divest the bankrupt of all right in the sum consigned, and that it was not struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5. Stiven v. Reynolds & Co., Jan. 20, 1891, p. 422.

Delivery of goods within sixty days—Act 1696, c. 5.

7. A spirit-merchant, whose goods were stored in a bonded warehouse, of which he was tenant, obtained advances of money on the security of certain goods in the warehouse, for which he granted to the lender delivery-orders addressed to the excise officer, but did not deliver the goods to him from the warehouse till within sixty days of bankruptcy. Held that the delivery was void and null under the Act 1696, c. 5, and that the goods so delivered belonged to the bankrupt's estate. Rhind's Trustee v. Robertson & Baxter, March 4, 1891, p. 623.

Husband and Wife—Debt by husband to wife—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsecs. 1 and 4.

8. A husband six days prior to his sequestration granted to his wife a promissory-note, payable one day after date, for £1370, as the amount of sums lent to him at various times by his wife out of her separate estate. On the same day the wife assigned the promissory-note and the sum contained therein to a relative in consideration of a payment of £50. The wife's assignee thereafter lodged a claim for £1370 in the husband's sequestration. Held that, having regard to subsecs. 1 and 4 of sec. 1 of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, the wife's assignee was only entitled to be ranked upon whatever assets might remain after the whole

BANK—Continued.

to extend the credit by £1000 on receiving an additional obligation from two of the obligants. Held (1) (following Reddie v. Williamson, 1 Macph. 228) that the bank by debiting the account with the year's interest in each year extinguished the claim for that interest, and converted it into an advance of principal; and therefore (2) that the personal obligants were only liable under the cash-credit obligations for the £1500 and £1000 of principal, with interest thereon from 31st October 1887, the date of the last balance, and that a voluntary liquidation of the company had not the effect of closing the account. Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees, Jan. 31, 1891, p. 476.

Stock Exchange—Fraud.

3. A stockbroker, whose bank account was overdrawn, paid into it a sum of money by endorsing a cheque received by him from another broker, to whom he had sold certain shares, on instructions from a body of trustees to sell and invest the price on deposit with certain colonial banks. The ordinary course of business on the Stock Exchange is that the selling broker receives the buying broker's cheque, and makes payment to his own customer by his own cheque, or, where he has instructions to re-invest, by delivery of the new investments. The sum paid by the broker into his account did not extinguish the overdraft. The broker made no re-investment for the trustees, and within a few days absconded without having further operated on his bank account to any substantial extent. The trustees sued the bank for the sum paid in. The bank officials deponed that they believed the money to have come into the broker's hands in the course of his business as a broker. Held that the bank was not liable to the trustees. Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, March 19, 1891, p. 751.

See Bill of Exchange, 4.

BANKRUPTCY. Notour Bankruptcy—Diligence—Poinding—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 7, 9, 12—Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 6.

1. Section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which equalises arrestments and poindings used within sixty days prior to, or four months subsequent to "the constitution of notour bankruptcy," contemplates the original constitution of notour bankruptcy only; and subsequent proceedings, which would of themselves have constituted notour bankruptcy, do not form a new constitution of notour bankruptcy to the effect of equalising diligence, notwithstanding the proviso of section 9 of the Act. Wood v. Cranston & Elliot, Jan. 13, 1891, p. 382.

Sequestration—Contingent Debt—Claim for expenses in litigation—Decree for interim execution pending appeal—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 14.

2. Held that a claim for the expenses of a Court of Session action for which the successful party had obtained decree for interim execution pending an appeal by his opponent to the House of Lords, was a "contingent" debt, and could not therefore support a petition for sequestration under the above enactment. Forbes v. Whyte, Nov. 29, 1890, p. 182.

Sequestration — Discharge — Appeal — Competency — Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 170.

3. In a petition in the Sheriff Court by a bankrupt for discharge, the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor of 1st October 1890, found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge and appointed him to make a declaration in terms of the statute. Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor of 10th October, found the declaration made by the bankrupt satisfactory, and discharged him. On 15th October an objecting creditor appealed under the 170th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856. Held that although the appeal was competent as an appeal against the interlocutor of 10th October, it did not also submit to review the prior interlocutor of 1st October, which was a substantive judgment, and had become final as not having been appealed against within the period prescribed by the Act. Alison v. Robertson's Trustees, Dec. 9, 1890, p. 212.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Sequestration—Discharge—Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 6.

4. In a petition by a bankrupt for discharge, the Sheriff, after consideration of a report by the trustee that the bankruptcy had arisen from innocent misfortune, pronounced an interlocutor finding the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, and appointed him to make a declaration in terms of the statute. Thereafter the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor in which he found the declaration satisfactory, and discharged the bankrupt. An objecting creditor appealed, under sec. 170 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, against this interlocutor, and stated that it contained no finding by the Sheriff that he had in terms of section 6 of the Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881, satisfied himself that the bankrupt's failure to pay a dividend of 5s. in the pound had arisen from circumstances for which he could not justly be held responsible. The Court refused the appeal, holding (1) that it was entirely within the Sheriff's discretion whether he should require the additional evidence on the question prescribed by subsection 2 of the 6th section of the Act; (2) that he might require such evidence at any time before actually discharging the bankrupt; and (3) that he must be assumed to have satisfied himself as to the facts referred to in the section before he granted the discharge. Alison v. Robertson's Trustees, Dec. 9, 1890, p. 212.

Preference—Compensation—Reduction—Title to sue—Act 1696, c. 5—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 10 and 11.

5. The Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 10 and 11, does not deprive an individual creditor of his title to reduce illegal preferences under the Act 1696, cap. 5, alleged to have been granted to his prejudice. Brown & Co. v. M'Callum, Dec. 19, 1890, p. 311.

Preference—Arrestment—Consignation—Act 1696, c. 5.

6. A pursuer used arrestments on the dependence of an action. Subsequently by arrangement between him and the defender, who denied liability, the latter consigned a sum in the hands of the Clerk of Court. The defender was sequestrated within sixty days of the arrestment, and thereafter the pursuer obtained decree in the action, in respect of the trustee not having sisted himself as a defender, and the bankrupt having failed to find caution. In a competition for the consigned fund, between the bankrupt's trustee and the pursuer, held that the pursuer was entitled to the fund, on the ground that the effect of the consignation was to divest the bankrupt of all right in the sum consigned, and that it was not struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5. Stiven v. Reynolds & Co., Jan. 20, 1891, p. 422.

Delivery of goods within sixty days—Act 1696, c. 5.

7. A spirit-merchant, whose goods were stored in a bonded warehouse, of which he was tenant, obtained advances of money on the security of certain goods in the warehouse, for which he granted to the lender delivery-orders addressed to the excise officer, but did not deliver the goods to him from the warehouse till within sixty days of bankruptcy. Held that the delivery was void and null under the Act 1696, c. 5, and that the goods so delivered belonged to the bankrupt's estate. Rhind's Trustee v. Robertson & Baxter, March 4, 1891, p. 623.

Husband and Wife—Debt by husband to wife—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsecs. 1 and 4.

8. A husband six days prior to his sequestration granted to his wife a promissory-note, payable one day after date, for £1370, as the amount of sums lent to him at various times by his wife out of her separate estate. On the same day the wife assigned the promissory-note and the sum contained therein to a relative in consideration of a payment of £50. The wife's assignee thereafter lodged a claim for £1370 in the husband's sequestration. Held that, having regard to subsecs. 1 and 4 of sec. 1 of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, the wife's assignee was only entitled to be ranked upon whatever assets might remain after the whole claims of the ordinary creditors of the bankrupt had been satisfied. Cochrane v. Lamont's Trustees, Jan. 24, 1891, p. 451.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Computation of time—Arrestment—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 5 and 108.

9. Held that the 108th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 applied in a case where an arrestment had been used on 20th April and sequestration had taken place on June 19th, according to the computation of time prescribed by the 5th section of the Act. Stiven v. Reynolds & Co., Jan. 20, 1891, p. 422.

Trustee—Adoption of bankrupt's contract.

10. A lease provided that the rent "payable for the last crop of the lease shall be exigible by the proprietor previous to the removal of any part of said crop from the ground," the tenant having the option of either paying the rent in advance, with certain discount, or finding security for payment. The tenant became bankrupt three months before the end of the lease, and his trustee thereafter directed and controlled all farm operations, keeping a large number of milch cows, subletting some pasture, and generally ingathering the crops. The landlord sought to interdict the trustee and the tenant from removing any part of the crop, on the ground that the stipulation in the lease quoted above was good against the tenant, and therefore good against the trustee, in respect he had adopted the lease. Held that, assuming the clause to be good against the tenant, the actings of the trustee did not constitute an adoption of the lease, but were done in discharge of his duty of realisation of the estate. M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee, Feb. 27, 1891, p. 576.

Trustee—Vesting of heritable estate in trustee—Latent trust—Tantum et tale—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 102.

11. Held (diss. Lord M'Laren) that a sequestration vests in the trustee for behoof of the creditors heritage to which the bankrupt holds an unqualified feudal title in his own name, although he holds it only in trust for the true owner. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustee, July 14, 1891, p. 1166.

Appointment of new trustee—Discharge of both trustee and bankrupt—Abandonment of claim—Nobile officium.

12. Certain creditors upon a sequestrated estate on which both the trustee and the bankrupt had been discharged, the latter without composition, presented a petition for a remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to appoint a meeting of creditors for the election of a new trustee, averring that there were funds belonging to the sequestrated estate which had not been recovered, and that the petitioners had not been paid their debts in full. It was objected that all claim to these funds had been abandoned by the trustee. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the petition fell to be granted. Whyte v. Northern Heritable Securities Investment Co., June 16, 1891, H. L., p. 37.

Cessio—Decree of cessio in debtor's absence—Form of interlocutor granting decree—Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881, sec. 9.

13. In a petition for cessio, the Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators, in respect the debtor has failed to appear at this diet for examination as ordered by last interlocutor, and has not taken means to satisfy the Sheriff-substitute that his absence was not wilful, decerns the debtor . . . to execute a disposition omnium bonorum." The Court reduced the decree in respect that the Sheriff-substitute had set forth a reason for granting decree other than that he was satisfied that the debtor's absence was wilful. Mackenzie v. Ewart, June 13, 1891, p. 925.

Sale of bankrupt estate—Purchase by law-agents employed by trustee in sequestration—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 120.

14. The law-agents who had been employed by the trustee in a sequestration bought certain of the sequestrated effects which had been exposed by the trustee for sale by public roup. An unsuccessful bidder brought an action for reduction of the sale, and for declarator that he had become the purchaser of the subjects at the upset price, which was offered by him, on the ground that the law-agents had arranged with the trustee not to hold him personally liable for payment of their account, that there were no assets to which the agents had to look for payment save the subjects sold, and that the value of the subjects did not exceed the amount of their account. He pleaded that the sale was thus truly made for their behoof, and that they were not entitled to bid. The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) held that the fact that the defenders had substantially the sole interest in the sale would at common law have disqualified them from bidding at the sale, but that as creditors they were entitled to do so under section 120 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. On a reclaiming note, held that at common law the agents were not disqualified from bidding by the interest they had in the sale, the subject sold being the property of the trustee, and the offer to purchase being made bona fide and not for the purpose of increasing the price.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Opinions (per Lord Young and Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that a law-agent employed by the trustee in a sequestration is not in respect of his account a creditor in the sequestration in the sense of the 120th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act of 1856. Rutherfurd v. MacGregor & Co., July 4, 1891, p. 1061.

See Sale, 2.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. Charge—Suspension—Caution—Partnership.

1. One of six partners of a trading firm, which had sold its business to a limited company, granted a promissory-note, to which he signed the firm name as well as his own. The other partners having been charged to pay brought a bill of suspension. The respondents averred that the complainers had adopted the promissory-note. Held that, as the firm's signature could not bind the partners after the dissolution of the firm, and it lay upon the respondents to prove their averments of adoption, the bill should be passed without caution. Goodwin v. Industrial and General Trust, Limited, Dec. 6, 1890, p. 193.

Partnership—Firm signature.

2. A partner in a firm of builders, who by the contract of copartnery was precluded from signing bills, adhibited the firm name to certain promissory-notes in favour of a money-lender, with whom he discounted them at the rate of 40 per cent per annum. The notes were not granted in the course of the firm's business, and the proceeds were applied to the partner's own use. The firm, having been charged upon the notes, brought a suspension. Held that the loss occasioned by the fraudulent granting of the notes must fall upon the money-lender, who discounted them in suspicious circumstances without inquiry, and not upon the partners of the firm, as they were ignorant of the transaction, and as the transaction was not in the course of the firm's business or for its behoof. Paterson Brothers v. Gladstone, Jan. 15, 1891, p. 403.

Proof—Parole—Competency—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 100.

3. The National Bank of Australasia, holders of a bill of exchange for value drawn upon Phipps, Turnbull, & Company of Melbourne, which Phipps, Turnbull, & Company had refused to accept, and which had been protested against the drawers for non-payment, brought an action on the bill against the drawers. The defenders averred that for many years prior to 1881 they had acted as agents in this country for Phipps, Turnbull, & Company for the purpose of procuring and forwarding consignments of such goods as Phipps, Turnbull, & Company desired for the Australian markets, and that all transactions were financed by bills drawn by the defenders upon Phipps, Turnbull, & Company under arrangement with the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, who agreed to discount all bills drawn by the defenders upon the said Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, on receiving indorsed the bills of lading of the various consignments, and to look to Phipps, Turnbull, & Company alone for payment; that in 1881 Phipps, Turnbull, &

BILL OF EXCHANGE—Continued.

Company made similar arrangements with the pursuers' London office, and "explained to the pursuers that Phipps, Turnbull, & Company were alone to be liable on any bills discounted by the pursuers drawn by the defenders on them, on receipt of the bills of lading indorsed, which the pursuers agreed to. . . . At the date of said arrangement the defenders were wholly unknown to the pursuers. . . . Though the bills libelled bear to be drawn by the defenders, they personally received no value for them. It was a fact well known to the pursuers that the defenders were to act merely as the agents of Messrs Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, and it was agreed to by them that Messrs Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, on whom they relied solely for payment, were alone to be liable under the bills condescended on." Held that the defence could not be admitted to probation, the Lord President and Lord M'Laren holding that notwithstanding the terms of the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, it was incompetent for the defenders to contradict by parole their liability as it appeared on the face of the bill, and Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear holding that the averment was irrelevant inasmuch as the agreement founded on therein must be construed as an agreement to come into operation only in the event of bills being accepted by Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, which was not averred.

Opinion (per Lord Adam) that under the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, it was competent for the drawer of a bill, in a question with a holder for value, to prove a parole agreement contradicting his liability on the face of the bill. National Bank of Australasia v. Turnbull & Co., March 5, 1891, p. 629.

Payment and discharge—Cancellation without authority—Liability of agent employed to collect bill.

4. The agent of a bank offered to try to obtain payment of a bill which had been protested for non-payment, and the holders accepted the offer. The acceptors offered to pay the bill and the protest charges on the condition that they should not be called upon to pay interest and expenses. The bank's agent communicated this condition to the holders, and without waiting for authority took payment of the bill and protest charges, marked the bill paid, and delivered it to the acceptors, who deleted their names thereon. Thereafter the holders intimated their refusal to agree to the condition on which payment had been made, refused to accept the sum tendered to them by the agent of the bank, and received back the bill cancelled, the money being repaid to the acceptors. The holders then raised an action against the acceptors for the amount of the bill, with interest, and for the expenses of the action, and obtained decree, but the estates of the acceptors became bankrupt before diligence could be used against them. The holders thereupon raised an action against the bank, concluding for the amount of the bill, with interest, and for the expenses of their action against the acceptors. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the evidence shewed that if the bill had not been cancelled through the error of the agent of the bank, the holders might have recovered payment by summary diligence before the acceptors had become bankrupt, and that the bank was liable. Bank of Scotland v. Dominion Bank, June 9, 1891, H. L., p. 21.

BURGH. Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction.

1. Held that the Dean of Guild has jurisdiction to require the plans of all new buildings proposed to be erected within burgh to be laid before his Court, although such buildings may be entirely within the enclosed property of the person who is erecting them, and at such a distance from the outside boundaries of it as not to threaten any encroachment on neighbouring properties or danger to persons using the public thoroughfares. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, v. M'Jannet, Oct. 30, 1890, p. 34.

Dean of Guild—Appeal—Competency.

2. Held that a petition for a lining presented to the Dean of Guild of Glasgow was a common law proceeding, and that his judgment thereon, without a record having been made up, was not excluded from review by the Glasgow Police Act, 1866. Allan v. Whyte, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 332.

BURGH—Continued.

3. In terms of sec. 384 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, the Master of Works gave notice to the proprietor of a back court, requiring him to fence it, and intimating that if he had any objections he must lodge the same in writing with the clerk to the Police Commissioners within six days. No objections were lodged, and thereafter the Dean of Guild, on the application of the Procurator-fiscal, after hearing the proprietor's objections, but without a record having been made up, pronounced an interlocutor, granting a warrant for the execution of the work at the proprietor's cost on the ground that there was danger to persons using the court from the want of a fence. The proprietor having appealed, the Procurator-fiscal objected that the appeal was incompetent under sec. 277 of the Act, in respect that no record had been made up. The appellant contended that, as the public had no right of access to the court, the want of a fence could not be "dangerous" in the sense of the Act, and that the Dean of Guild had exceeded his jurisdiction in granting the warrant. Held that the interlocutor was in pursuance of the Act, and that the appeal was incompetent, as no record had been made up. Walker v. Lang, June 13, 1891, p. 928.

4. An interlocutor by a Dean of Guild refusing to sist as respondent a person who alleges a material interest to appear in a petition for authority to take down and rebuild a house is a final interlocutor quoad that person, and therefore appealable. Lawrie v. Jackson, July 15, 1891, p. 1154.

Dean of Guild—Petition for authority to erect new buildings—Right of neighbouring proprietor to be sisted as a party to the process.

5. Circumstances in which the Court (diss. Lord M'Laren) recalled an interlocutor of a Dean of Guild refusing to sist as a respondent to a petition for authority to erect new buildings a proprietor whose property did not immediately adjoin that on which it was proposed to erect the new buildings. Lawrie v. Jackson, July 15, 1891, p. 1154.

Dean of Guild—Nuisance.

6. Opinion that it was beyond the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild of Glasgow to decide whether a proposed erection would be a nuisance. North British Railway Co. v. Moore, July 1, 1891, p. 1021.

Reparation—Wrongous apprehension—Glasgow Police Act, 1866.

7. In an action of damages for wrongous apprehension against two police-constables and the Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow as Police-Commissioners, the Magistrates and Town-Council were assoilzied on the ground that the constables were not their servants, the control and management of the police being vested in another statutory body—a committee of the Police Commissioners—and the Sheriff. Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow, May 16, 1891, p. 825.

Free space for air—Dean of Guild—Glasgow Police Act, 1866.

8. Held that the Dean of Guild of Glasgow was not entitled to refuse his sanction to plans lodged in a process of lining because there was not exclusively on the applicant's own ground the free space required by the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sections 367 and 370, to be in front of a room intended to be used as a sleeping apartment, seeing that there was in existing circumstances sufficient free space over ground belonging to a different proprietor. Allan v. Whyte, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 332.

Private court—"House"—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 177.

9. The 177th section of the General Police Act of 1862 provides that it shall not be lawful to build any court of less than a certain specified width, and that "to any such court in which there shall be more than eight houses there shall be an additional width of one foot for every such additional house," and that there shall be an entrance of the full width of the court open from the ground upwards. Held that the section applied to courts to be formed on back-ground exclusively private property. Couper v. Surveyor of Maryhill, March 6, 1891, p. 642.

BURGH—Continued.

Trade incorporation—Member—Qualification.

10. A tailor in Annan, who was born and received his education in Ayr, brought an action against the Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr for declarator that he was entitled to be admitted a member of the Incorporation as being the son of a member, and averred that by immemorial usage the sons of members were as such entitled to be admitted, although not resident in Ayr. The defenders did not dispute that the pursuer's father had been a member at his death, but denied the averment of usage. The Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders, holding that the averment of usage was not proved. On a reclaiming note the pursuer abandoned the averment of usage, and contended that he was entitled to admission as being a tailor in Scotland, and offered, if necessary, to amend his summons to that effect. Held that the proposed amendment, even if competent, would be irrelevant. Loudon v. Tailors of Ayr, Feb. 20, 1891, p. 549.

See Police, 1.

CARRIAGE. Railway—Common carriers—Traders' waggons.

A railway company conveyed a trader's waggons containing coal along their lines, and after delivery of the coal conveyed the empty waggons back to the collieries, the sole charge made being a rate of 1s. 7½d. per ton, whereas the rate for the conveyance of coal on waggons belonging to the company was 2s. On the return journey some of the waggons were destroyed through an accident to the train caused by a latent defect in the waggon of another trader, which was in the same train. Held that the railway company were not liable for the safe delivery of the waggons as under a contract of carriage. Barr & Sons v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 21, 1890, p. 139.

See Railway, 2, 5.

CAUTIONER. Conditions—Guarantee for servant's fidelity—Failure of master to use checks stipulated for.

An insurance association entered into a contract with a merchant and a traveller employed by him by which the association agreed, on payment of a premium, to guarantee the employer to a certain amount against loss by embezzlement on the part of the traveller. The contract set forth that the employer had delivered to the association a proposal containing certain statements, and a declaration setting forth, inter alia, "the checks to be kept upon" the traveller's "accounts, and has consented that such proposal and declaration, and each of the statements therein referred to or contained, shall form the basis of the contract," and this agreement is granted on the condition that the business of the employer shall be conducted in every particular in accordance with the said proposal, statements, and declaration, except with the consent of the association in writing." The proposal referred to contained the following questions to and answers by the employer:—"(Q.) How often will the employer balance and settle the applicant's accounts? (A.) Monthly. (Q.) Specify the checks which the employer will use to secure accuracy in the applicant's accounts. (A.) Statements sent to customers by employer. (Q.) In particular, will the employer send accounts direct to customers, and if so, how often? (A.) Every three months." In an action by the employer against the association for payment of the amount of a sum embezzled by the traveller, it was proved in defence that no monthly settlements had been made between the employer and the traveller, and that the practice had been that, at the end of three months from the date of an order, the employer sent the account, not to the customer direct, but to the traveller himself for collection. Held that the employer had failed to comply with the conditions of the contract, and that the defenders were not liable. Haworth & Co. v. Sickness and Accident Insurance Association, Limited, Feb. 26, 1891, p. 563.

See Bill of Exchange, 1—Process, 9.

CESSIO. See Bankruptcy, 13.

CHURCH. Encroachment on burying-ground—Powers of kirk-session—Heritors. Held that the heritors in a parish, as proprietors in trust of the parish church and churchyard, along with the kirk-session, as administrators thereof, were entitled, in a case of high expediency, to encroach upon the burying-ground in enlarging the church, although this involved the removal of soil from a portion of the ground which had for a long period been used as a common burying-ground—no private rights being interfered with, sixteen years having elapsed since the last interment, and the churchyard having been closed as a burying-ground.

Observed that the rights of a kirk-session in regard to the church and burying-ground of a parish are rights of administration only.

Observed that a singular successor in an estate has no right of sepulture in part of a burying-ground which has been acquired by his predecessor in title. Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish, June 12, 1891, p. 911.

CITATION. See Jurisdiction, 2—Process, 1—Sheriff, 1.

COMPANY. Promotion-money—Preliminary expenses—Liability to account—Personal bar.

1. A public company, formed for the purpose of introducing a new system of tramways in Edinburgh, entered into an agreement with contractors for the execution of the works at a certain price, one provision being that the expenses of procuring the Act should be met by the contractors. M. and B., the company's solicitor and engineer, who had also been its chief promoters, on the next day executed a second agreement with the contractors on their own behalf, by which they undertook to relieve the contractors of their obligation for expenses in consideration of a sum of £17,000. The company having brought an action some years afterwards calling M. and B. to account for any moneys received by them under that agreement, the defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the transaction had been known to the company, or to all who were members of it at the time, and that the company was therefore barred from now challenging it. Held that the defenders' fiduciary relation to the company precluded them from deriving any private advantage from the agreement, and that they were bound to account to the company for sums received by them under it. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann, July 14, 1891, p. 1140.

Rectification of register—Misrepresentation—Misrepresentation of reason why certain directors had retired—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 35.

2. The memorandum of association of a company, registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-1886, bore that the registered office of the company would be in England, but in the copy of the memorandum of association printed on the back of the prospectus it was stated that the registered office would be in Scotland. In consequence of this discrepancy no allotment of shares was made, the company was wound up, and a new company was formed, with its registered office in Scotland. The prospectus of the original company bore that Mr Esslemont, M.P., was to be the chairman, and Dr Clark, M.P., one of the directors of that company, and in a circular sent along with the prospectus of the new company to persons who had applied for shares in the original company it was stated, after explaining the necessity for the formation of the new company, that, "as the company will now fall to be managed in Glasgow, Messrs Esslemont and Clark, the two members of Parliament (whose parliamentary duties will prevent their attendance at the board), and Mr M'Cankie [another original director] have retired." This circular then requested the applicants to renew their applications for shares. Certain persons who had applied for shares in the original company, and had had shares allotted to them in the new company on their renewed application after receiving the above circular, sometime afterwards petitioned the Court to order the removal of their names from the register of the new company. They averred that they had applied for shares on the faith of the representation that Mr Esslemont was to be chairman, and Dr Clark a director of the company; that they had renewed their application only in consequence of the statement that these gentlemen had retired from the board because their parliamentary duties made it impossible for them to attend the meetings of the board in Glasgow; and that this statement was false, and was calculated to deceive, as the true reason why Messrs Esslemont and Clark had retired was that they were dissatisfied with the prospects of the company. The company denied these averments, and pleaded that they were irrelevant. The Court refused the petition, holding that as the petitioners had applied for shares after the distinct statement that Messrs Esslemont and Clark were not to be on the board, it was irrelevant to inquire into the truth of the reasons stated for their retirement. Chambers v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Aërated Bread Co., Limited, July 3, 1891, p. 1039.

COMPANY—Continued.

Resolution to alter memorandum of association—Confirmation by Court—Companies Memorandum of Association Act, 1890, sec. 1.

3. Application for confirmation of resolution to alter a memorandum of association, under the above Act, in part granted, and in part refused. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow. March 13, 1891, p. 675.

Title to sue—Reduction—Shareholder—Directors.

4. An individual shareholder in a public company brought an action for reduction of an agreement between the company and certain contractors for the construction of certain lines of tramway as authorised by Act of Parliament, the allegations being (1) that the agreement had been entered into in contravention of the Act of Parliament, in respect that there had been no competition for the contract, although there had been previous agreements between the company and the Corporation of Edinburgh and Leith, which were confirmed by the Act of Parliament, to the effect that the works to be executed by the company should "form the subject of competition"; (2) that the directors of the company who had concluded the agreement were disqualified by having interests apart from the interest of the company in the contract to which it related; and (3) that the pecuniary conditions of the contract were such as shewed that it had been carried through by means of a fraudulent scheme whereby the pursuer and the minority of the shareholders were defrauded by the majority. The parties to the agreement were all called as defenders. The Court repelled the reasons of reduction and assoilzied the defenders, holding (1) that the stipulation as to competition being one between the company and the two corporations, the pursuer had no title to enforce it; (2) that in point of fact there was no such conflict between the personal interests of the directors and their duty to the company as would disqualify them from acting, and that, even if there had been, such objection had been obviated by the homologation of the company at a general meeting; and (3) that although a minority of the shareholders had a title to plead fraud, it had not been proved that there had been any fraud practised by the majority upon them, or that a bad bargain had been made knowingly or in disregard of the interests of the company, with the intent to sacrifice the interests of the company and of the minority. Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co., Dec. 18, 1890, p. 264.

Surrender of shares—Purchase of shares—Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867.

5. Circumstances in which held that a limited company was entitled to accept a surrender of shares by an insolvent shareholder without reserving its right to recover unpaid calls, as a fair compromise of the company's claims against the shareholder, and that when the company afterwards went into liquidation the liquidator was not entitled to reduce the transaction on the ground that it was ultra vires of the company. General Property Investment Co., Limited, and Liquidator v. Craig, Jan. 15, 1891, p. 389.

COMPANY—Continued.

Creation of preference shares by company—Ultra vires—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 12.

6. The memorandum of association of a company registered under the Companies Act, 1862, and limited by shares, provided that the capital of the company should be £1,000,000 divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each. The articles of association provided that the company might, by special resolution, increase the capital, and might "determine the conditions on which such increase shall be made, the number and amount of the shares into which such increased capital shall be divided, and the time, mode, and terms at, and according to which, such last-mentioned shares shall be issued, and how the premium, if any, on such shares shall be applied." Held that a special resolution of the company to increase the capital of the company by the creation of preference shares was ultra vires. Ramsbotham v. Scottish American Investment Co., Limited, Feb. 25, 1891, p. 558.

Shares—Certificates fraudulently issued by secretary of the company—Right of bona fide holder for value—Damages for failure to place on register.

7. A person advanced money to B on the security of share certificates bearing that B had a certain number of fully paid £10 shares in a limited company. The certificates bore the common seal of the company, and the signatures of two directors and of the secretary. In an action by the lender against the company for damages arising from their refusing to register the shares in terms of the certificates, the company pleaded that B had only paid £1 per share, that the certificates had been issued by the secretary without the authority of the company, that he had fraudulently allowed them to remain in B's hands, and that B was a party to the fraud. Held that the objection could not be sustained, as the pursuer was entitled to rely upon the validity of the certificates. Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co. March 11, 1891, p. 652.

Division of profits—Rights of preference and ordinary shareholders.

8. The shares of a limited company were divided into A or preference, and B or ordinary shares, the former to rank prior to the latter on the profits of each year for a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent on the amount paid up, and the latter to rank on the balance of the profits of each year remaining after payment of the preferential dividend, also for a 10 per cent dividend. Any surplus was to belong to both classes of shares without any priority between them. It was also provided that "no deficiency in dividend in any year shall be made good out of the profits of future years." For several years there was a loss on the revenue account resulting in a debit balance at 30th April 1889 of £7867. During the year ending 30th April 1890 net profits were earned to the amount of £6909, which sum was applied in reducing the debt previously incurred, and no dividends were declared. During next year, ending 30th April 1891, net profits were earned sufficient to wipe out the remainder of the debt, and leave a surplus for division, after paying a 10 per cent dividend to the A shareholders as for that year. In a special case between the A and B shareholders the former contended that they were entitled to have this surplus applied in payment to them of a 10 per cent dividend, as for the year ending 30th April 1890, in respect of the net profits of £6909 earned during that year. Held that the A shareholders were not entitled to a dividend for the year ending 30th April 1890, Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren holding that the profits of that year had been properly applied in reducing the debt, Lord Kinnear holding that the A shareholders were barred from raising the question by the statement in the case that the sum of £6909 was not available for dividend in that year. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, v. Hurll, March 20, 1891, p. 805.

Reserve and depreciation fund—Distribution among shareholders on sale of undertaking.

9. The directors of a gas company, as authorised by the articles of association, from time to time carried parts of the company's profits to a reserve fund and a depreciation fund. The directors paid repairs of the works out of revenue, and applied the whole of the reserve and depreciation funds to the extension of works and other capital purposes of the company. The company's undertaking having been sold, a question arose between the preference shareholders, who had always received their full dividend, and the ordinary shareholders, as to the mode in which these funds should be dealt with. Held that the ordinary shareholders were entitled to both funds, and that they fell to be deducted from the price of the works before a distribution among all the shareholders was made. Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co., Limited, v. Taylor, July 1, 1891, p. 1017.

COMPANY—Continued.

Sale of undertaking—Parliamentary proceedings.

10. Held that the expenses incurred by a gas company in parliamentary proceedings, which resulted in an arrangement under which the company's undertaking was sold, should not be charged against the revenue of the year preceding the sale, but against the price obtained for the undertaking. Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co., Limited, v. Taylor, July 1, 1891, p. 1017.

Winding-up—Creditor—Voluntary winding-up placed under supervision—Resolution to wind up—Companies Act, 1862, secs. 79 and 129.

11. A company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, for the purpose, inter alia, of carrying on an Exhibition of Electrical Engineering, &c. "during the year 1890." A few days before 1st November, when the Exhibition was to be closed, a creditor presented a petition stating that the company was unable to pay its debts, and praying that it be wound up by the Court. On 5th November the company at a general meeting passed a resolution that the company should be wound up voluntarily, and appointed a liquidator. The liquidator, with concurrence of certain creditors, applied to the Court by a note in the creditor's petition for an order placing the voluntary liquidation under the supervision of the Court. The Court held (1) that the resolution (though neither extraordinary nor special) was competent under sec. 129, subsec. (1), of the Companies Act, 1862; (2) that notwithstanding the prior petition by the creditor for judicial liquidation, the voluntary liquidation was lawful and expedient, and ought not to be interfered with; and (3) that the note by the liquidator in the creditor's petition craving an order placing the liquidation under the supervision of the Court should be granted, and the appointment of the liquidator confirmed. The creditor's petition was accordingly refused. Drysdale & Gilmour v. Liquidator of International Exhibition of Electrical Engineering and Inventions, Nov. 13, 1890, p. 98.

Winding-up—Prosecution by liquidator of action raised by third party—Sanction of Court.

12. An action was raised by the trustee in a sequestration in the interests and on the guarantee of a company registered under the Companies Acts. The defender in these actions was assoilzied, with expenses, in the Outer-House, and the pursuer reclaimed. Thereafter a winding-up order was pronounced, and the liquidator of the company petitioned the Court to sanction the prosecution of the reclaiming note by him either in his own name or in that of the original pursuer, and in the latter case to approve of his guaranteeing the pursuer his expenses. The liquidator stated that he had been advised by counsel that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was such as ought to be brought under review. The Court authorised the liquidator to prosecute the reclaiming note in his own name, holding that having obtained the opinion of counsel he was justified in insisting in the reclaiming note, but that, as an officer of Court, he ought to be master of the process. Millar, Nov. 29, 1890, p. 179.

Winding-up—Expenses of endeavour to form new company—Liquidator—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 161.

13. By special resolutions of 10th June 1889 a limited company resolved to wind up voluntarily, appointed a liquidator, with full powers under section

COMPANY—Continued.

161 of the Companies Act, 1862, to accept shares or other like interests in any other joint stock company, in payment or part payment for the company's assets, and appointed a committee to confer with him as to a proposed reconstruction or amalgamation scheme. The liquidator incurred considerable outlay in endeavouring to form a new company to take over the company's business. These endeavours proved unsuccessful. The funds of the company proved insufficient to pay all its debts, and on 15th March 1890 a creditor obtained an order placing the liquidation under the supervision of the Court, removing the liquidator, and appointing another in his place. The sanction of the Court to the resolution of 10th June was not applied for. Held that the liquidator who had been removed was not entitled in accounting for his intromissions to credit for his outlay in endeavouring to form a new company. Liquidator of Scottish Assurance Corporation v. Miller, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 496.

Winding-up—Forfeiture of shares prior to liquidation—Liability for unpaid calls—Fraud.

14. When shares in a public company are forfeited for non-payment of calls, the holder of such shares ceases to be a member, and becomes merely a debtor of the company, and therefore is not barred by the subsequent liquidation of the company from pleading in answer to a demand for payment of the calls that he was induced to take the shares through the fraudulent misrepresentations of the company. Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon, March 19, 1891, p. 772.

Winding-up—Agreement to give fully paid-up shares—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 25.

15. A person who had sold a paper mill, &c. to a limited company, formed for the purpose of acquiring it and carrying on the business, for the sum of £12,000, agreed to take £8500 of the price in fully paid-up shares of the company. This agreement appeared in the minutes of the directors of the company, and was carried out by the issue of shares to the vendor, but was never filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies. The company having become insolvent and gone into liquidation, the liquidators proposed to place the vendor on the list of contributories in respect of shares so issued and still held by him, with liability to the amount of the uncalled capital effeiring to them. The vendor maintained that the shares must be treated as fully paid up, and that no liability attached to him in respect of them. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling) that he must be placed on the list of contributories with liability as contended for by the liquidators, diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion that the transaction, following on the agreement, was virtually a payment in cash for the shares to their full value by the vendor. Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, v. Law, July 8, 1891, p. 1076.

Company limited by guarantee—Right in security—Pledge—Power to hypothecate guarantee letters in security of advances—Ultra vires—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 9.

16. In the memorandum and articles of association of a company registered under the Companies Act, 1862, as a company limited by guarantee and empowered to create a guarantee fund, the subscribers to which were in the event of a winding-up, and there being a deficiency of assets, to contribute to the assets of the company to the extent of their guarantee, it was provided that the company might borrow money, and, in security thereof, assign or hypothecate to the lender the guarantee obligations, letters, and relative documents from subscribers to the guarantee fund. The executive council having borrowed a sum of money from a bank in terms of the above provisions, hypothecated the letters of guarantee to the bank in security of the advance. In a voluntary liquidation, under supervision of the Court, the liquidator presented a note praying the Court to ordain the bank to deliver the letters to him, and to declare that the bank had no valid security or preference over or letters of guarantee for payment of their advances. (Stormonth Darling) granted the prayer of the petition, the guarantee fund had no existence until the company ɔn, and then only in the event of there being a deficiency he purpose of equal distribution among the creditors, it ıe executive council to create a security over it in favour :editor; and (2) that in any view the hypothecation or ı was ineffectual to constitute a preference over the fund ı the liquidator, who was entitled to possession of the ı of the fund. Robertson v. British Linen Co., July 18, ıquidate damage—Agreement by purchaser to deposit a in the event of failing to implement.

ɣotiations for the purchase of a business, the intending ɔ deposit in bank in the joint names of himself and of sum "as part payment of the price," it being stipu- ent of his failure "to pay the balance of the purchase- certain date, the deposit should "be forfeited to" the isfaction of all causes of action, and the purchaser shall ı to endorse the deposit-receipt" for the money. The complete the purchase by payment of the purchase price. s were entitled, without going into any proof of damage, ɔy deposited. Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, 90, p. 80.

ɔlisher.
ıng, Lord Rutherfurd Clark, and Lord Trayner) that the ı author and a publisher, by which the publisher takes profits are halved, is a contract of sale of the right to of the book to which the contract refers. Cunningham ewart's Trustee, Jan. 29, 1891, p. 460.

—Lex loci actus.
1888 an agreement was entered into in New York be- behalf of Hannay, of Glasgow, the inventor of a new ıg white lead, and Shedlock and Hudson, of New York, ɔentions for the two Americas, and to designate to them aid process" upon certain terms. The agreement was ned by Hannay at Glasgow subject to certain conditions ɔd in writing by Shedlock and Hudson at New York. rought an action of damages in Scotland against Hannay ad sold his rights in connection with the invention, and d the agreement, held that as the agreement was made w York, its validity and meaning fell to be determined York. Shedlock v. Hannay, March 11, 1891, p. 663.

ɔe of heritage. Dowie v. Tennant, June 23, 1891, p. 986.

ɔ pamphlet—Drawings.
a certain kind of cement for increasing the strength of ɔ them damp-proof, issued a pamphlet of twelve pages ment, in which were set forth the virtues of his cement, of construction to which it was applicable, and the ɔ it. This pamphlet, which was registered under the ıd 6 Vict. c. 45), contained a drawing of a double brick wo single brick walls with a small space between them, inclined on the top of one of the walls to guide the ɔity between the two. Another manufacturer issued a ɔ forth the virtues of his cement for increasing the strength of walls and rendering them damp-proof. He mentioned several kinds of construction to which it was applicable, which had been mentioned by the other manufacturer, and to illustrate the method of application he gave a drawing of a brick wall at the same angle of perspective, with the same number of courses of bricks, and with a tray inclined on its top at the same angle and with the same supports as in the other person's drawing. The former manufacturer having brought an action of interdict on the ground of infringement of his copyright in the pamphlet, held that the nature and extent of the similarity between the text and the illustration of the two advertisements were not such as to constitute any infringement of copyright. White v. Briggs, Dec. 10, 1890, p. 223.

COPYRIGHT—Continued.

Copyright of design—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883—Extra-territorial effect—Infringement.

2. Held that the copyright of design, which is protected under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, has no extraterritorial effect, and that the manufacture and sale by British subjects in a foreign country of goods, the design of which is protected under the statute, is not an infringement of that copyright. Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 511.

CROFTER. See Jurisdiction, 5—Lease, 6, 7, 8, 9.

CURATOR BONIS. See Judicial Factor, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

DEAN OF GUILD. See Burgh, 1 to 6, 8.

DEATHBED. See Heritable and Moveable, 4—Prescription, 3—Succession, 10, 11—Trust, 5.

DELIVERY. See Right in Security, 2.

DEPOSIT. See Bank, 1.

DILIGENCE. Service—Messenger-at-arms.

1. Warrant granted to sheriff-officers to execute a diligence in respect that there was no resident messenger-at-arms. North of Scotland Bank, Limited, Jan. 27, 1891, p. 460.

Meditatio fugæ—Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 4—Contingent debt.

2. Held that the rule of the common law that a debtor cannot be apprehended as being in meditatione fugæ if imprisonment is incompetent on account of the debt which he owes, applies to cases in which imprisonment has been rendered incompetent by the above Act.

Question whether such diligence could in any case be used in respect of a contingent debt. Hart v. Anderson's Trustees, Nov. 28, 1890, p. 169.

See Bill of Exchange, 1—Reparation, 20 to 24.

DISCHARGE. Confusio—Right in security—Ground-annual.

1. A lady, by trust-disposition and settlement, directed her trustees to dispone certain heritable subjects to a person named, "under burden of any heritable securities that may affect the same, and the feu-duty, ground-annual, and other burdens affecting it." Prior to the date of her settlement the truster had obtained assignations to the only ground-annuals affecting the subjects. She subsequently paid up a bond affecting the subjects, and took an assignation thereto. Held (1) that the bond had been extinguished confusione, and that the disponee was entitled to the property free of the burden of this bond, but (2) that he must take the property under burden of the ground-annuals, that being the intention of the truster as expressed by her settlement. Murray v. Parlane's Trustee, Dec. 18, 1890, p. 287.

Implied discharge—Annuity.

2. A widow was entitled under her marriage-contract to an annuity from her husband's estate. In an action by her for payment of certain half-yearly portions of this annuity her husband's trustees admitted that during the

she had not received the annuity directly, but stated eriod she had resided with her husband's mother, who the estate, that the money had been paid to the latter, ıer had agreed to her maintenance during that period ıer annuity. They produced a minute of a meeting of ıtees, of whom the pursuer was one, and at which she was ıute, which was not signed by the pursuer, bore,—"This ton stated, had not been paid directly to her, but as she y with the late" mother-in-law, "out of whose funds and 'anton's property the house expenses were defrayed, she the annuity be set off against her maintenance." The hat she did not understand what took place at the meetnever agreed to give up her claim to the annuity during ed with her mother-in-law. Parole evidence was led to suer acquiesced in and approved of the manner in which ıeen applied. The trustees also produced eleven receipts
'ments of the annuity subsequent to the death of the hus-Held that no intention to discharge the trustees had been ı v. Panton's Trustees, March 19, 1891, p. 728.

ıes for personal injury.

*eller, who had been injured in a railway accident, accepted ı the railway company, and granted them a receipt bearing accepted by him "in full of all claim competent" to him
y and loss sustained by him in the accident in question.
nths after granting this receipt he raised an action of he company concluding for £5000. The company pleaded the terms of the receipt they were entitled to be assoilzied.
e was led—as to the pursuer's state of mind and body at ng the receipt, and at the time of the proof—as to the in-in giving and taking the receipt, and—as to the capacity understand it. The pursuer at the time of granting the isited by the railway company's surgeon, but not by any y himself. He had no external injuries, but had sustained
He had no legal advice, and the receipt was granted nine ident. The Lord Ordinary awarded him £500, and to Second Division adhered. The House of Lords, being of riting signed by the pursuer was a discharge, that there ıt on the part of the railway company to mislead the pur-capable of understanding the meaning of the writing, and ı no understanding between him and the person who acted at there was any reservation of claims made by the pur-the discharge was granted*, reversed these judgments and ders. North British Railway Co. v. Wood, July 2, 1891,

Bill of Exchange, 4.

iction, 3.

ion, 13.

ehold Franchise—Tenant and Occupant—Lease—Valua-usive on question of occupancy—Representation of the sec. 5.

oprietor, became tenant, in 1885, under a lease for seven premises used for the printing and publication of his 887 the business was converted into a limited company, ging director and editor, and occupying, by arrangement ectors, a room on the premises of the annual value of r his editorial work, as well as for his own private busihe was entered on the Valuation-roll as tenant and

ELECTION LAW—Continued.

occupier of the premises. The rent and taxes of the premises were paid by the company to the landlord, who was also secretary of the limited company, but there was no assignation of the lease to the company. Held that M. was entitled to remain on the roll as tenant and occupier of the premises. Mackenzie v. Fraser, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 346.

Household Qualification—"Inhabitant occupier"—Residence—Representation of the People Act, 1884, secs. 2 and 7, subsec. 4—Representation of the People Act, 1868, sec. 3.

2. A person whose principal residence was in Glasgow, resided for three or four months in summer in a cottage, at a rent of £3 a-year, in Arran. He did not sublet the cottage, and kept it locked up when he was not living in it. Held that he was not entitled to be entered upon the Valuation-roll as an inhabitant-occupier of the cottage in the sense of the Representation of the People Acts, 1868 and 1884. Stewart v. M'Fadzean, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 349.

Burgh Occupation Franchise—Residence within burgh—Sheriff-substitute necessarily resident out of burgh—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1838, sec. 5—Reform (Scotland) Act, 1832.

3. The Sheriff-substitute of Forfarshire, at Dundee, claimed to be entered on the roll of voters for the burgh of Edinburgh under section 11 of the Reform (Scotland) Act, 1832, as owner of a house in Nelson Street, Edinburgh. Except in the month of April (when he resided almost continuously in Edinburgh) he occupied lodgings in Dundee during eleven days and nights out of each fortnight, and during the remaining three days and nights of each fortnight he resided in Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, in which his wife and family resided. Held that he must be assumed to be resident in Dundee in compliance with the provisions of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1838, and that therefore his residence in Edinburgh was only incidental, and did not entitle him to be enrolled as a voter. Smith v. Falconer, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 343.

Burgh Occupation Franchise—Combination of period of occupancy as lodger with period of occupancy as tenant—Representation of the People Act, 1868.

4. A period of occupancy as lodger cannot be combined with a period of occupancy as tenant and occupant of a dwelling-house within burgh so as to entitle the occupant to the burgh occupation franchise under the Representation of the People Act, 1868. Falconer v. Lessels, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 351.

Burgh Franchise—Lodger—Residence—Absence from lodgings during part of the year—Representation of the People Act, 1868, sec. 4.

5. A son occupied, as a lodger, rooms of the statutory value in his father's house, for which he paid rent to his father, residing in them during nine months of the year. During the remaining three months he was absent in the country, and the house was shut up, but he had access to it at any time he desired. Held that he had been resident during the statutory period required by the 4th section of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868. Falconer v. Dunlop, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 342.

Burgh Franchise—Lodger—Occupancy "separately and as sole tenant"—Representation of the People Act, 1868, sec. 4.

6. A son, as a lodger, paid his mother rent for the exclusive use of a bedroom, and for the joint use with her of other rooms. The clear annual value of his rights of use or occupation was sufficient, but the value of the bedroom taken alone was insufficient. Held that he did not occupy lodgings of the statutory value "separately and as sole tenant," and was therefore not entitled to the franchise under the 4th section of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868. Gray v. Deuchar, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 341.

County Franchise—Household Franchise—Payment of rates—Failure to pay—Notice—Representation of the People Act, 1884, sec. 2, and sec. 7, subsec. 4—Representation of the People Act, 1868, secs. 3 and 18.

7. In the parish of C it was the practice to assess the owner of premises where the rental was under £4 for the tenant's share of parochial rates, leaving it optional to the owner to recover from his tenant the latter's share of the rates. In such cases no assessment notice was sent to the tenant, although his name appeared on the Valuation-roll for the assessment leviable in respect of his tenancy. R. was tenant of a house of the value of £3, 10s. in the parish of C., and, though he had never paid rates, he had been entered upon the roll as an inhabitant-occupier, and tenant of the house. In 1890 the owner was exempted by the parochial board from payment of rates, but no notice of assessment was sent to R. An objection was taken to R.'s name remaining on the roll in respect he had failed to pay poor-rates in the sense of section 3 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868. Held that R. was not disqualified, as no statutory notice of assessment had been sent to him in terms of section 18 of that Act. Neilson, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 338.

ELECTION LAW—Continued.

County Franchise—Service Franchise—Son working on father's farm with no contract of service—Representation of the People Act, 1884, sec. 3.

8. A son worked as a farm-servant upon his father's farm but without any contract of service. He took his meals in family with his father and received from him what money he required from time to time. He had the exclusive use, rent free, of a room in a cottage on the farm which was occupied by his grandmother, who paid no rent for the house to the father. Held that he was not entitled to be entered upon the roll as an inhabitant-occupier by virtue of "service" under section 3 of the Reform Act, 1884, as there was no proof that his occupancy was connected with service. Aitchison v. Lothian, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 337.

ENTAIL. Heir in possession—Provisions to children, authority to charge fee and rents with, by bond and disposition in security—Entail Amendment Act, 1848, sec. 21.

1. A deed of entail, dated in 1769, conferred power upon heirs of entail to grant provisions to their younger children, "to affect the rents of the lands, . . . such provision to be given by each heir of tailzie to his or her children, . . . not exceeding three years' rent of the estate, and which provisions shall only affect the persons of the succeeding heirs of tailzie possessing the estate and the rents thereof, to the extent of one-half of whatever the heir does possess yearly, and any estate, real or personal, belonging to them, other than the said entailed estate or rents thereof, until the provisions given in manner foresaid to the children of the former heirs of entail shall be satisfied and paid, at least shall affect the same no further than to the extent of what shall have been paid, or otherways extinguished of the provisions given to the children of the former heir, so that the whole provisions shall at no time exceed the sum of three years' rent." In 1818 A, the heir of entail then in possession, granted a bond of provision to his younger children to the amount of three years' rents. B, the succeeding heir, possessed from 1820 to 1859 without having paid off any of the bond. C, the next heir, having in 1889 presented a petition for disentail, the question arose whether the bond was one which could be made to affect the fee of the estate under sec. 21 of the Rutherfurd Act. C contended that it could not, in respect that it was not intended to be a permanent burden, but to be paid off each year by the heir in possession to the amount of one-half of the rents, and that B's representatives were liable for the debt. Held that the bond was one which could have been made to affect the fee of the estate under sec. 21 of the Rutherfurd Act, and that it fell to be paid by the disentailer. Jardine v. Grant, June 2, 1891, p. 870.

Disentail—Obligation to secure descent of estate undertaken in marriage-contract—Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 17.

2. By antenuptial marriage-contract dated in 1870, an heir of entail in possession made the provisions allowed under the Aberdeen Act for "the child or children to be procreated of the said intended marriage, who shall not succeed to the said entailed lands." It was also declared that the "provisions before written to children of the said intended marriage are hereby declared to be in full satisfaction to the whole children of the said intended marriage (including the heir who will succeed to the foresaid entailed lands and estates) of all bairns' part of gear, legitim," &c. The deed contained no provision in favour of the child who should succeed to the entailed estate. It was provided that "execution shall pass hereon at the instance" of certain persons named "for the implement of the whole provisions hereinbefore written, conceived in favour of" "the child or children of the said intended marriage." There were no children born of the marriage, but the spouses were still alive when the husband brought a petition for disentail of the estates without having obtained the consent of the persons appointed under the deed to see its provisions implemented. Held by Lord Low (Ordinary) that there was no obligation in the marriage-contract securing the descent of the estates upon issue of the marriage, and therefore that the consent of these persons was not required. Pringle v. Pringle, June 12, 1891, p. 895.

ENTAIL—Continued.

Disentail—Expectancy of substitute heirs—Valuation of estate.

3. In a question between an heir of entail petitioning for disentail and substitute heirs as to the value of the estate, held that the estate fell to be valued at twenty-six years' purchase, the average value of estates in the district, although the estate in question was in a dilapidated condition. Pringle v. Pringle, June 12, 1891, p. 895.

Disentail—Entail Act, 1882.

4. The conditions upon which the Court is authorised to dispense with the consent of an heir under the above Act are imperative, and must be strictly complied with. Baird v. Baird, July 15, 1891, p. 1184.

See Sale, 5, 6, 7.

ERROR. Issue—Fraud—Reduction—Essential error induced by misrepresentation—"Falsely and fraudulently."

In a trust-settlement the testator directed that the residue of the estate should "be under the control and at the disposal of my said executor, W. P." W. P. founded on the settlement as giving him a beneficial right to the residue. In an action of reduction of the trust-settlement raised against W. P. by a brother of the deceased the pursuer averred that the deceased had signed the deed under essential error as to its import and effect induced by the false and fraudulent representations of the defender—that the deed merely appointed him the trustee or manager of the estate, and that the pursuer and other relatives were to have the beneficial interest therein. The pursuer contended that he was entitled to an issue of essential error induced by the defender's misrepresentations. Held that the issue must bear essential error induced by the defender's false and fraudulent representations. Collie v. Pyper, Jan. 20, 1891, p. 419.

EXECUTOR. Appointment.

In a holograph settlement the testator appointed a person, naming him, "judicial factor, to carry out the purposes of this trust." Held that the person so named was entitled to be confirmed as executor-nominate. Tod, Nov. 25, 1890, p. 152.

EXPENSES. Appeal.

1. Petition for interim execution pending appeal. Expenses of petition and of extract. King, Brown, & Co. v. Anglo-American Brush Electric Light Corporation, Limited, Feb. 7, 1891, p. 540.

Shipping casualty appeal.

2. In an inquiry at the instance of the Board of Trade, the Court, while refusing an appeal by the master against a suspension of his certificate, found no expenses due, as the bulk of the evidence led and printed related to a portion of the case which was departed from by the Board of Trade when the case came before the Court of Session. Brown v. Board of Trade, Dec. 18, 1890, p. 291.

EXPENSES—Continued.

Arrestments on the dependence—Recall.

3. A defender, against whom arrestments on the dependence had been used, after decree paid the whole sum decerned for. The pursuer having refused extrajudicially to loose the arrestments, the defender presented a petition for that purpose. Held that the defender was not entitled to recover from the pursuer the expense of the petition. Roy v. Turner, March 18, 1891, p. 717.

Party conducting his own case.

4. Held that a party to an action residing at a distance from the seat of the Court who conducts his own case personally and is found entitled to expenses is not entitled to charge against the opposite party anything in respect of personal expenses while absent from his home attending the litigation. Forbes v. Whyte, March 17, 1891, p. 688.

See Process, 6, 7, 9—Ship, 10.

FISHING. Salmon-fishing—Fixed Engine—Net.

1. Net which was held not to be a "fixed engine," and mode of fishing which was held not illegal. Earl of Wemyss v. Earl of Zetland, Nov. 18, 1890, p. 126.

Salmon-fishings—Property—Title—Barony—Cruive.

2. In an action brought in 1889 by the Duke of Argyll for declarator that he had right to salmon-fishings in the River Awe ex adverso of the lands of E on the south or left bank of the river, with the exception of certain pools, the pursuer founded on a crown charter of novodamus of 1667 which contained a grant of the barony of Lochow with the salmon-fishings. The lands of E formed part of the barony of Lochow, and had been feued to the defender's authors under reservation of the fishings in the Awe. It was not disputed that the defender had had possession of the salmon-fishings in question for upwards of forty years. The defender pleaded that the pursuer had no title to sue, and, on the merits, founded on a crown charter of confirmation of 1727, conveying to a predecessor the barony of Kilmaronaig, described as "comprehending," inter alia, the lands of Ardchonnel "cum salmonum piscatione aquae de Awe vizt. tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Polindownan et Polinstuck, et tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Cruback, et tractus (lie) draughts salmonum de Sanluip jacen in aqua et ore ejusdem cum omnibus earundem privilegiis et pertinen, atqe. (lie) cruives super dictam aquam de Awe." It appeared from the charter of erection of the barony of Kilmaronaig that the lands of Ardchonnel and the Awe fishings attached thereto were not included in the barony; Kilmaronaig and Ardchonnel were both distant from the River Awe. Held (1st) that the pursuer's charter of novodamus of 1667 was a valid grant of the barony of Lochow with the salmon-fishings thereof, and by implication included salmon-fishings in the Awe, where it adjoined the lands of the barony, up to the medium filum of the river; (2d) that the defender had no title to which his possession of the salmon-fishings could be ascribed, in respect (1) that the defender's crown charter of confirmation of 1727, being merely a charter by progress, did not incorporate the lands of Ardchonnel and the fishings in the Awe with the barony of Kilmaronaig, so as to give the defender a barony title to salmon-fishings in the Awe; (2) that the defender's title to the barony of Kilmaronaig could not be connected with his possession of salmon-fishings at a distance from it; and (3) that the defender's title to the lands of Ardchonnel with the salmon-fishings specified could not be construed by possession into a general grant of salmon-fishings, but was limited to the pools and cruives mentioned. Duke of Argyll v. Campbell, July 9, 1891, p. 1094.

FOREIGN. Jurisdiction—Contract—Lex loci actus.

1. On 16th November 1888 an agreement was entered into in New York between Duncan on behalf of Hannay, of Glasgow, the inventor of a new process for producing white lead, and Shedlock and Hudson, of New FOREIGN—Continued.

York, "for sale of said inventions for the two Americas, and to designate to them power to handle said process" upon certain terms. The agreement was subsequently confirmed by Hannay at Glasgow subject to certain conditions which were accepted in writing by Shedlock and Hudson at New York. The latter having brought an action of damages in Scotland against Hannay in respect that he had sold his rights in connection with the invention, and had thereby violated the agreement, held that as the agreement was made and executed in New York, its validity and meaning fell to be determined by the law of New York. Shedlock v. Hannay, March 11, 1891, p. 663.

Trust—Administration of trust—Jurisdiction of English Court to determine right of administration of English heritage belonging to a Scotsman.

2. A testator, domiciled in Scotland, conveyed to trustees his whole estate, consisting in part of English heritage, and gave them powers of sale. He declared that he desired his affairs to be administered and wound up, as far as practicable, in accordance with the law of Scotland. He left, among other legacies, three legacies to a nephew, who was his heir, and directed that the residue of his estate should be divided among charities. By the English Statute of Mortmain charities cannot take heritage or the proceeds of heritage under a mortis causa deed. The trustees raised an action in the Scots Courts, with a conclusion, inter alia, for declarator that they were entitled to call upon the heir, as a condition of taking the English heritage, to bear a rateable proportion, corresponding to the value of the real estate, of the whole debts, legacies, and bequests made by the testator, with a view of dividing, under their own administration in Scotland, the whole estate, so as to carry out, as fully as possible, all the trust purposes. The heir thereupon took proceedings in the English Court for the purpose of ascertaining his rights to the English estate, and for obtaining administration of the testator's real and personal estates, but only in so far as it might be necessary or proper for the purpose of obtaining for himself the English real estate free of all liabilities. The Scots Court sisted procedure in the declarator, to await the decision of the English Court as to the right to administer the English heritage. Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson, March 20, 1891, p. 793.

Agent and Principal.

3. Although there may be a general usage in the foreign trade which raises a presumption that a British commission-merchant contracts as a principal and not as agent for a foreign trader, the presumption will give way to evidence that the commission-merchant is acting as agent for a foreign trader, and when this is so, the law of principal and agent will apply. Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co., June 19, 1891, p. 975.

Succession—Interpretation of Settlement—Lex domicilii—Lex loci actus.

4. Questions as to the interpretation of a mortis causa deed disposing of moveable estate must be solved by the law of the domicile of the granter of the deed, unless the deed shall disclose an intention on the part of its granter that some other law should be invoked. Circumstances which were held to be insufficient to displace the general rule. Smith v. Smiths, July 3, 1891, p. 1036.

Copyright of design—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883—Extraterritorial effect—Infringement.

5. Held that the copyright of design, which is protected under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, has no extraterritorial effect, and that the manufacture and sale by British subjects in a foreign country of goods, the design of which is protected under the statute, is not an infringement of that copyright. Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 511.

See Husband and Wife, 3—Jurisdiction, 1, 2, 3, 4, 6—Process, 11.

FRAUD. See Bank, 3—Company, 4, 7, 14—Error.

GROUND-ANNUAL. See Discharge, 1.

GUILD, DEAN OF. See Burgh, 1 to 6, 8.

HARBOUR. Bye-law of harbour trustees—Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, sec. 93—Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, sec. 83.

Greenock Harbour Trustees made a bye-law purporting to regulate the speed of vessels in the fairway of the navigable channel of the River Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works. Held that as the fairway of the navigable channel of the River Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works was not within the harbour, the bye-law was ultra vires of the trustees under the above Acts. Kerr v. Auld, Dec. 19, 1890, Just. Cases, p. 12.

See Ship, 10, 11.

[ERITABLE AND MOVEABLE. Succession—Heritable bond—Titles to Lands Act, 1868, sec. 117.

. A truster directed her trustees to divide the residue of her "moveable means and estate" among certain persons, and, "with regard to the disposal and division or destination of" her "heritable estate," she directed it to be valued, and "divided, apportioned, and disposed of" to certain other persons. Besides other property, heritable and moveable, she died possessed of two bonds and dispositions in security in favour of herself and her executors or assignees whomsoever, and of a bond of annuity with disposition in security in favour of herself and her heirs or assignees whomsoever. Held that the three bonds were to be regarded as part of ıer moveable estate. Hughes' Trustees v. Corsane, Dec. 19, 1890, p. 299.

:ession—Jus relictæ—Heritable security—Titles to Lands Consolidation ct, 1868, sec. 117.

'estatrix directed her trustees "to hold, apply, pay, and convey the whole idue" of her estate for behoof of her three children. The trustees had ower to sell heritage, and to call up investments. One of the sons, who rived his mother, died after the residue had been divided with the exceof a heritable bond for £1500 which belonged to the deceased testatrix. question between the son's widow and daughter, held that the son's in the bond was a moveable jus crediti, and was subject to jus relictæ. an v. Gilligan, Jan. 15, 1891, p. 387.

m—Conversion.

stances in which it was held that the exercise of a power of sale was nsable to the execution of the trust, and that therefore the heritage treated as moveable succession. Brown's Trustees v. Brown, Dec. , p. 185.

—Spes successionis—Deathbed.

nee's right to a spes successionis to heritable property, though jus crediti, is a heritable right, and was subject to the law of prior to its abolition. Thain v. Thain, July 18, 1891, p. 1196.

urchaser—Fixtures—Pictures.

on between the purchaser and seller of a mansion-house, held ıre, valued at £100, painted on canvas, and inserted as a panel ire-place in the dining-room, was moveable, although its removal d a stone and lime wall. Cochrane v. Stevenson, July 18,)8.

FE. Promise to marry—Mora—Acquiescence.

f damages raised in 1889 for breach of a promise to marry e been made in 1879, the defender admitted the promise, but he pursuer's claim was barred by mora and acquiescence. It fore a jury that from 1881 till the raising of the action, the ı living in the same town as the defender, had hardly ever efender, and when passing him in the street simply recog- in 1885, hearing that he was engaged to another woman ed in 1889), she wrote to her intimating her prior engage- returned a verdict for the pursuer. On a motion for a new trial, the Court refused to disturb the verdict. Colvin v. Johnstone, Nov. 14, 1890, p. 115.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 6—Marriage prior to Act—Jus relicti.

2. By antenuptial marriage-contract, entered into in 1862 a wife conveyed to trustees her whole estate, heritable and moveable, for payment of the free yearly income to herself during her life, exclusive of her husband's jus mariti and right of administration, and after her death for payment to her husband of an alimentary liferent of it, which was to cease on his entering into a second marriage. On the death of the spouses the capital was to be conveyed and paid to the issue of the marriage, if any, and failing them, to the wife's "own heirs whomsoever." The wife predeceased her husband, and there were no issue of the marriage. She left no further writing disposing of her estate. The husband took no benefit from his liferent, and married a second time shortly afterwards. In a special case, to which the husband and the wife's next of kin were parties, held that the former was entitled, under section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, to take one-half of his wife's estate. Simons' Trustee v. Neilson, Nov. 20, 1890, p. 135.

Surrogatum—Donation inter virum et uxorem—Foreign—Sale of English heritage belonging to wife.

3. The wife of a domiciled Scotsman, with her husband's concurrence, sold the estate of X, in England, belonging to her, and acknowledged the conveyance before two commissioners in terms of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 74, for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, declaring at the same time that she intended to give up her interest in the estate without having any provision made for her in lieu thereof. Her husband received the price and applied it to his own uses. The spouses afterwards separated by mutual consent, and the wife executed a deed of revocation of all donations and provisions made by her in her husband's favour. She then brought an action against him for declarator that the £18,000 in his hands was either (1) a surrogatum for her heritage, and not subject to the jus mariti, or (2) was a donation to him which she had validly revoked. Held (rev. judgment of First Division) that by the law of England the husband on his marriage acquired an estate in his wife's heritage, so that at the date of the sale the estate was the heritable estate of the husband as well as of the wife, and that the price could not be regarded as a surrogatum for her estate. Welch v. Tennent, July 28, 1891, H. L., p. 72.

Parent and Child.

4. Custody of Child—Expenses. Hutchison v. Hutchison, Dec. 19, 1890, p. 237.

Process—Reponing—Decree in absence.

5. In an action of separation and aliment by a wife against her husband, the summons was served personally on the defender, and notice of the diet of proof was sent to him by registered letter. He did not lodge defences nor appear at the diet of proof, but decree having been pronounced against him, he lodged a reclaiming note. The pursuer objected to the competency of the reclaiming note and pleaded that the only competent course for the defender was to bring a reduction of the decree. The Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to repone the defender upon such terms as to his Lordship should seem fit. Whyte v. Whyte, Jan. 31, 1891, p. 469.

Bankruptcy—Debt by husband to wife—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsecs. 1 and 4.

6. A husband six days prior to his sequestration granted to his wife a promissory-note, payable one day after date, for £1370, as the amount of sums lent to him at various times by his wife out of her separate estate. On the same day the wife assigned the promissory-note and the sum contained therein to a relative in consideration of a payment of £50. The wife's assignee thereafter lodged a claim for £1370 in the husband's sequestration. Held that, having regard to subsecs. 1 and 4 of sec. 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, the wife's assignee was only entitled to be ranked upon whatever assets might remain after the whole claims of the ordinary creditors of the bankrupt had been satisfied. Cochrane v. Lamont's Trustee, Jan. 24, 1891, p. 451.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

See Heritable and Moveable, 2—Marriage-contract.

INNUENDO. See Reparation, 13, 16, 18, 19.

INSANITY. See Judicial Factor, 5—Process, 11.

INSURANCE. Marine insurance—Collision clause—Vessel under tow—Damage caused by tug to stranger ship.

In a policy of marine insurance the underwriters insured the ship "Niobe" "from the Clyde (in tow) to Cardiff . . . while there and thence to Singapore," and agreed "that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay, to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel . . . any sum or sums of money, . . . " to pay the insured a certain proportion of the sum so paid. Through the fault of the "Niobe" and of her tug the latter came into collision with and sunk another vessel, whose owners recovered damages both from the "Niobe" and the tug. In an action by the owners of the "Niobe" upon the policy against one of the underwriters for payment of his proportion of the sum paid by the pursuers on account of the collision, the defender pleaded that under the policy he was only liable for damage arising from collision with the "Niobe." Held (aff. judgment of Second Division), diss. Lord Bramwell, that in maritime usage the word "ship" was frequently understood to cover a ship and the tug by which it was towed, and that it fell to be construed in this sense in the collision clause of the policy, and that the defender was liable. M'Cowan v. Baine & Johnstone, July 27, 1891, H. L., p. 57.

See Arbitration, 3.

INTERDICT.

It is not a ground for refusing to enforce an established right by interdict that the granting of interdict will cause inconvenience or pecuniary loss to the person resisting the granting of the interdict out of all proportion to the loss which would result to the other party from refusing interdict. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart, June 19, 1891, p. 957.

See Mines and Minerals, 3.

INTEREST. See Succession, 22, 23.

ISSUE. See Error—Reparation, 12, 15, 18, 19, 21, 22.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. Factor loco tutoris—Appointment of Mother—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, secs. 2 and 8.

1. Held where a father had died without nominating tutors for his pupil children, that it was not competent to appoint the mother as factor loco tutoris to them, as she was already by operation of the above enactment their tutor. Willison, Dec. 11, 1890, p. 228.

Factor loco tutoris—Father's duty as administrator-in-law of pupil child.

2. A father presented a petition for the appointment of a factor loco tutoris to his daughter—in respect of a sum of £9000, to which she had right—with power to prosecute an action of damages for the loss of part thereof—on the ground that the petitioner's interests might conflict with those of his daughter in the prosecution of the action. The Court refused the petition on the ground that the petitioner had failed to shew that any conflict of interests would arise. Cochrane, Jan. 24, 1891, p. 456.

Factor loco tutoris—Parent and Child—Custody of child.

3. Circumstances in which authority was granted to a factor loco tutoris to detain the person of his ward in Scotland in opposition to the wishes of the ward's father, who was resident abroad. Moncreiff, July 1, 1891, p. 1029.

JUDICIAL FACTOR—Continued.

Curator bonis—Appointment pending brieve of cognition.

4. Circumstances in which the Court appointed the nearest agnate, who was suing a brieve of cognition, to be curator bonis to an insane person. Simpson v. Simpson, July 18, 1891, p. 1207.

Insanity—Insane delusion—Opposition of alleged incapax—Necessity for cognition or judicial inquiry.

5. When a petition for the appointment of a curator bonis to a person alleged to be incapable of managing his own affairs is opposed by him, he is not entitled to demand cognition or a formal judicial inquiry at which witnesses shall be examined on oath, with an opportunity for cross-examination, before the appointment is made, but the Court is entitled to adopt what course it considers best to obtain the information necessary, and, if it sees fit, to proceed on the reports of medical men.

The wife of a man who was detained in a lunatic asylum presented a petition for the appointment of a curator bonis to her husband. He opposed the petition, maintaining that he could not be superseded in the management of his affairs except under cognition upon a brieve from Chancery. He did not dispute the propriety of his being in the asylum, but stated that such delusions as he might labour under in no way interfered with his business capacity. The First Division, on a consideration of medical reports obtained by the petitioner, by the respondent, and by the Court, granted the petition. On appeal judgment affirmed. C B v. A B, June 25, 1891, H. L., p. 40.

Partnership.

6. By the contract of copartnery of a wholesale wine and spirit business it was provided that on a dissolution of the firm the business should be realised by one of the partners named with all convenient speed. This partner contributed no capital to the business. The firm was dissolved in 1888. In 1890 the remaining partners presented a petition for the appointment of a judicial factor on the partnership estates, averring that the partner whose duty it was to realise had been carrying on the business instead of realising. This averment he denied. The accounts were of consent remitted to an accountant, who reported that since the dissolution of the firm the business had been carried on as a going concern. The Court appointed an accountant to be judicial factor to wind up the business. Allan v. Gronmeyer, March 20, 1891, p. 784.

Investment—Personal liability.

7. A curator bonis lent funds belonging to his ward on the security of a tenement of houses and shops in a new street which was then in the course of formation in Dundee. When the loan was arranged the buildings were not nearly completed, but when the money was advanced the houses and shops were finished, and were for the most part let, but some workshops, of which the tenement also consisted, were unlet. The loan was made on a valuation by an architect of professional standing in Dundee, employed by the borrower. The valuation was made from plans, the buildings themselves not being examined. The security proved wholly inadequate to meet the loan. In an action by the executor of the ward against the curator bonis held that the security was not such as a trustee ought to have accepted, and that the defender was personally bound to replace the sum lent. Crabbe v. Whyte, July 7, 1891, p. 1065.

Process—Recall—Pupils Protection Act, 1849, secs. 1 and 31—Distribution of Business Act, sec. 4, subsec. 5.

8. Held (after consultation with the Judges of the First Division) that a petition for recall of the appointment of a curator bonis and for appointment of a new curator bonis is incompetent in the Inner-House, and must be presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary. Souter v. Finlay, Nov. 8, 1890, p. 86.

JURISDICTION. Ownership of heritage in Scotland—Sale—Posting of conveyance.

1. In a petitory action in the Court of Session against a domiciled American, whom the pursuers averred to be the proprietor of heritage in Scotland, the defender pleaded no jurisdiction, averring that although he had been at one time the proprietor of such heritage he had sold it before the raising of the action. It appeared that in October 1889 the defender became proprietor of certain heritable subjects in Scotland; that by improbative missives, dated November and December 1890, he sold these subjects; and on 9th January 1891 he executed and on 12th January dispatched by post from America a conveyance of the subjects in favour of the purchaser; and that this conveyance did not reach the purchaser till after the service of the summons, which took place on 21st January. Held that as the transference of the subjects had not been completed until after the service of the summons the plea of no jurisdiction fell to be repelled. Dowie & Co. v. Tennant, June 23, 1891, p. 986.

DICTION—Continued.
tation—Meditatio Fugæ.
A domiciled Englishman resided in Scotland for six months for the purpose of managing an Exhibition for an association in Scotland. He became bound by a guarantee to contribute, if called upon, a certain sum to the funds of the exhibition, when it should come to be wound up at its close. After it had closed, and the association had gone into liquidation, and when he was about to return to England, he was apprehended as in meditatione fugæ at the instance of the liquidator as creditor under the guarantee, but was liberated on finding caution to answer any action to be brought against him for payment of the guarantee within a certain period, on being cited at the Sheriff-clerk's office, Edinburgh. In an action for payment of the guarantee, which was served at the house at which he had resided during his residence in Scotland within forty days of his leaving it, and also at the place of citation assigned under the bond of caution granted by him, he pleaded no jurisdiction, and stated that he was proceeding to reduce the meditatione fugæ proceedings as illegal. Held that the action being one to enforce a ground of action arising in Scotland, and the defender having (whether the meditatione fugæ proceedings were regular or not) undertaken to answer the action in the Scottish Court, on being cited at the place fixed in the bond, and the defender having been so cited, the plea must be repelled.

Question, whether jurisdiction, which has been acquired over a foreigner by forty days' residence in Scotland, endures for forty days after he has left Scotland. International Exhibition, 1890, v. Bapty, May 26, 1891, p. 843.
rum non conveniens—Succession—Domicile.
A Scotsman, who went in 1874 to reside in Manchester, in May 1889 executed a will in English form, in which he declared that his domicile was in England. He died in September 1889, and his executor obtained probate. The testator's only child having presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire to have it found that the testator died domiciled in Scotland, and obtained interim interdict against the executor distributing the funds without providing for payment of legitim, the executor on 16th December 1889 obtained from the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England an order that, inter alia, an inquiry should be made whether the testator was domiciled in England, and appointing a receiver to collect the estate. On 23d December 1889 the testator's daughter raised an action in the Court of Session, concluding for declarator that the testator was domiciled in Scotland, and that she was entitled to legitim. The Court, in respect that the question of domicile was before the Court in England, dismissed the action. Ferguson v. Buchanan, Nov. 15, 1890, p. 119.
ust—Forum non conveniens.
In an action by a legatee against two trustees who had taken out confirmation in Scotland under a Scotch trust-deed, the trustees pleaded no jurisdiction in respect that they were not resident in Scotland, and that the whole estate had been distributed twelve years before. The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the plea, holding that the jurisdiction once constituted against them by their obtaining confirmation, and acting as trustees under a Scottish trust, remained unaffected. M'Gennis v. Rooney, March 20, 1891, p. 817.

JURISDICTION—Continued.

Forum conveniens—Action in Court of Session—Application to Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, sec. 6.

5. Held that the jurisdiction of the Court of Session to entertain an action by a proprietor for declarator and interdict against crofters whose holdings adjoined his lands, and who asserted that at the date of the Act they had rights of pasturage over his property, was not ousted by an application made by the crofters prior to the raising of the action, and still pending, to have fair rents fixed for their holdings under the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886. Duke of Sutherland v. Reed, Dec. 18, 1890, p. 252.

Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Possession—Liability to account.

6. Arrestments to found jurisdiction having been used in the hands of O., shipbroker, Bo'ness, Scotland, the defenders, who resided in Sweden, pleaded no jurisdiction in respect that no property had been attached. A proof established the following facts:—The property alleged to have been attached was a lot of twenty tons of iron shipped and consigned by the defenders to W. in England, to whom the defenders were indebted, and who was to sell the iron and apply the price in extinction pro tanto of the debt. The goods, through a misunderstanding, were brought to Bo'ness. O., the arrestee, was employed by the captain as ship's broker, and was instructed by W. to store the iron to his (W.'s) order. O. stored the iron in a shed belonging to the Harbour Commissioners, of which shed the Commissioners kept the key, and for the use of which they charged rent. The iron was not stored to anyone's order, it not being the practice of the Commissioners to allow that to be done, and O. could at any time have got possession of the iron on his personal application. The Court sustained the plea of no jurisdiction and dismissed the action, on the ground (1) that the iron de facto was in possession of the Harbour Commissioners and not of O. at the date of the arrestments, and (2) that, assuming O. to have been in possession of the iron, he was under no liability to account therefor to the defenders, but only to W. Young v. Aktiebolaget Ofverums Bruk, Nov. 27, 1890, p. 163.

Suspension—Exclusion of review—Small-Debt Act, 1837, sec. 30.

7. A summons in the Small-Debt Court set forth that the defender was owing to the pursuer £12, as per note of claim. The note of claim bore,—"To half year's rent due by the defender, payable in advance . . . £12." The Sheriff gave decree for £12. The pursuer's agent subsequently, in a letter to the defender's agent, admitted that the £12 was the year's rent, but he refused to depart from the decree, as the whole year's rent was due, and executed a poinding upon the decree. In a suspension, held that it was incompetent to review the Sheriff's judgment on the merits, and that nothing had occurred since the decree to warrant the Court to suspend diligence. Wilson v. Scott, Dec. 12, 1890, p. 233.

See also Justiciary Cases, 1 to 4.

Teind Court—Reduction of locality subject to qualification.

8. In 1888 the proprietor of the lands of B. obtained decree of approbation of a report by subcommissioners in 1630 valuing his teinds. In 1890 he brought a reduction of a locality approved final in 1868, in which a stipend in excess of the teinds as reported to be the value in the subvaluation of 1630 had been localled upon his lands. He sought to have the locality set aside as erroneous ab initio, on the ground that the teinds were valued by the subcommissioners in 1630, and that their report had been eventually approved by the Court of Teinds. The Court of Teinds granted decree of reduction, but the decree "to have effect only from and after the date of the decree of approbation, 16th July 1888, for the second half of the crop of 1888, and in all time coming." Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope, Jan. 23, 1891, p. 445.

JURISDICTION—Continued.

Exclusion of Jurisdiction of Court of Session—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, sec. 30.

9. In an action against a Local Authority, by the owner of cattle slaughtered by their order, for compensation, the Local Authority founded on a minute of meeting after the date of the action in which they stated their opinion "that the pursuer had not adduced any reason to induce the Authority to pay compensation for these animals in regard to which it is alleged that an offence had been committed" and resolved to withhold compensation, and pleaded that the jurisdiction of the Court was excluded. The Court, in respect that the minute did not state that the defenders had ascertained and determined that the offences had been committed, adjourned the case to allow them to supply this defect in their determination, and on a subsequent minute of meeting being produced, setting forth a finding by them that the offences had been committed and their resolution to withhold compensation, the Court sustained the plea of no jurisdiction. Calder v. Local Authority of Linlithgow, Oct. 30, 1890, p. 48.

See Burgh, 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7—Foreign, 1, 2—Ship, 7.

JUS QUÆSITUM TERTIO. See Property, 3.

JUSTICE OF PEACE. See Administration of Justice, 1, 2.

JUSTICIARY CASES. Review—Appeal—Small-Debts Act, 1837.

1. In an action in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court for payment of £10 alleged to have been lent by the pursuer to the defender, the defender stated that the sum sued for had been given as a present to her by the pursuer. The Sheriff-substitute, on the pursuer's motion, took his oath, and refused to allow the defender to lead any evidence, and decerned against her for the sum sued for. The Court recalled the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, holding (1) that as the defender's admission that she had received the money from the pursuer was qualified by the statement that it was a donation, the Sheriff was not entitled to proceed upon the admission, and the pursuer's testimony that it was not a donation, and to exclude the defender's evidence; and (2) that the irregularity in the procedure was such as to make an appeal competent under the Small-Debt Act, 1837, sec. 31. Gordon v. Mulholland, Jan. 26, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 18.
2. In an action in the Small-Debt Court in which both parties appeared, the pursuer asked and obtained an adjournment on account of the non-appearance of his witnesses. At the adjourned diet the defender failed to appear, and decree was pronounced against him "in respect of his absence," with execution after a charge of ten free days. Held that there was no litiscontestation, that the decree was one in absence, and that the defender was therefore entitled to have execution sisted and his case reheard under section 16 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837. Montgomery v. Loughran, Feb. 2, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 25.
3. In an action in the Small-Debt Court by a wife against her husband concluding, inter alia, for expenses incurred in connection with a mutual deed of separation, the Sheriff-substitute at the first diet—both parties being present—remitted to the Auditor, before answer to report as to the law and practice with reference to the question as to a husband's liability for such expenses. After the report was lodged the pursuer enrolled the case, and intimated the diet to the defender. The defender appeared at the diet, but the pursuer failed to appear, and decree of absolvitor was pronounced in respect of her absence. She obtained a warrant for rehearing under section 16 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, and on the case being reheard, decree was pronounced in her favour. Held (per Lord Wellwood) that there had been litiscontestation at the first diet, and that the decree of absolvitor was a decree by default, and not a decree in absence, and that the warrant for rehearing was therefore incompetent, and the decree for the pursuer recalled. M'Neill v. M'Neill, March 5, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 38.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

4. The tenant of a house who had paid his last half year's rent due at Martinmas 1889, and whose tenancy did not expire till Whitsunday 1890, in January 1890 removed his furniture to a house in another town. The landlord raised in the Small-Debt Court a summons of sequestration in security of the rent to become due, and on the margin of the summons he wrote a minute in which he craved warrant to carry back the furniture to his house, in respect the tenant "had removed to another house the whole of the goods in the house, and subject to the pursuer's right of hypothec for the rent thereof due" in three months' time. No notice of these proceedings was given to the tenant. The Sheriff granted warrant as craved, and a sheriff-officer proceeded to the tenant's new abode and brought back the furniture to the landlord's house. The Court recalled the warrant, holding that the minute set forth no circumstances to justify the Sheriff in granting the warrant without notice to the defender. Johnston v. Young, Oct. 27, 1890, Just. Cases, p. 6.

Review—Appeal—Suspension—Competency—Revenue—7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 53, sec. 79.

5. A person who had been convicted in a Justice of Peace Court of selling beer by retail without having obtained a certificate and excise licence, in contravention of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. c. 91, brought a suspension of the conviction on the ground that the Justices before convicting had seen and considered a previous conviction for a similar offence. The Court refused the bill, holding that although the High Court had notwithstanding the provisions of the Act 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 53, sec. 79, power to entertain suspensions in certain exceptional circumstances, the averment of the complainer was not such as to entitle him to that remedy. Mackenzie v. Martin, Jan. 26, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 16.

Review—Suspension—Want of citation—Irregularity—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864—Schedule F.

6. A warrant of citation to appear before the Sheriff to answer a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts was executed by serving a copy of the complaint and of the Sheriff's warrant, but there was no formal citation to appear under the signature of the officer in terms of Schedule F of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864. The accused appeared at the diet specified in the Sheriff's warrant and was convicted. In a suspension held that as the accused had appeared at the diet he was barred from founding on the irregularity in the mode of citation. Stewart v. M'Niven, Feb. 2, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 36.

Review—Suspension—Relevancy—Specification—Mora.

7. Held that an objection to a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, on the ground of want of specification of facts of which the accused is entitled to notice, which has not been stated before trial, cannot be entertained by the High Court in a suspension of a conviction on the complaint. Stewart v. M'Niven, Feb. 2, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 36.

Review—Suspension—Sentence—Award of expenses in excess of statutory amount.

8. In a sentence the accused was adjudged to pay a penalty and also a sum of expenses in excess of the amount fixed by statute. The Court suspended the sentence quoad the award of expenses but quoad ultra allowed the sentence to stand. Stewart v. M'Niven, Feb. 2, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 36.

Review—Appeal—Mandatary.

9. Right of appeal where accused is abroad, and no mandatary is within the jurisdiction. Williamson v. Geddes, June 8, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 55.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Crimes and Offences—Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities Act, 1884, sec. 4—Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 13—Credit obtained by undischarged bankrupt—Complaint—Relevancy.

10. Held that it is not necessary to the relevancy of a complaint under section 4 of the Act of 1884 that the prosecutor should libel "intent to defraud," and that it is not necessary for the prosecutor to prove an intent to defraud.

Question whether the proviso in sec. 13 of the Act of 1880, "unless he prove . . . that he had no intent to defraud," was incorporated by reference into section 4 of the Act of 1884. Howman v. Mackie, Feb. 2, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 30.

Crimes and offences—Cruelty to animals—Dishorning cattle—Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850, sec. 1.

11. In a complaint against a cattle-dealer for a contravention of the Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850, alleged to have been committed in the dishorning of cattle, by sawing off their horns close to the skull, it was proved that the operation caused great pain to the animals operated upon, but that it was in common use over a large district in Scotland as the most effectual means of preventing the cattle goring one another when fed in courts. It was further proved that the operation was for the ultimate benefit of the cattle, and had been skilfully performed. Held that no offence had been committed under the statute. Todrick v. Wilson, March 13, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 41.

Crimes and offences—Poaching—Poaching Prevention Act, 1862.

12. Held that in order to justify a conviction under section 2 of the Poaching Prevention Act, 1862, it was not essential that the person in whose possession poaching implements and game are found should have been seen upon land in search of game or coming from land, but that the Sheriff or Justices are entitled to draw that inference from the possession of the poaching implements and game, and other facts in the case. M'Kenzie v. Lockhart, Oct. 27, 1890, Just. Cases, p. 1.

13. Circumstances in which it was held that a Sheriff was entitled to draw the inference that a carrier who had been found carrying in his cart a quantity of rabbits had been accessory before the fact to the act of poaching of the person from whom he had received the rabbits for carriage.

Question whether, if a carrier were found to have been "accessory" after the fact, it would warrant a conviction under the Act. Young v. Jameson, Jan. 26, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 20.

Crimes and offences—Intimidation—Complaint—Relevancy—Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, sec. 7 (1).

14. A complaint charging J. M. with a contravention of the above Act set forth that the accused, with a view to compel A. C. to abstain from a work in which he was engaged, and which he had a legal right to do, "did wrongfully and without legal authority intimidate A. C. by threatening him while so working" with personal violence if he continued to work. Held that the complaint was relevant, although it did not state that the threat had the effect of inducing A. C. to abstain from work. Agnew v. Munro, Feb. 2, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 22.

Crimes and offences—Persuading seaman to desert—Person verbally engaged as storekeeper who had not signed articles—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, secs. 2 and 257.

15. A, a storekeeper on a homeward bound vessel, was on her arrival formally discharged, but verbally re-engaged to act in that capacity for the vessel's next voyage, and also to remain by her and to attend to the stores while she lay in harbour. Before he had signed articles for the voyage, an attempt was made to induce him to leave the vessel by a delegate of a Seaman's Union. The delegate on being convicted of an offence under section 257 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, appealed to the High Court of Justiciary on the ground that A was not a "seaman" within the meaning of section 2 of the Act, because he had not signed articles. Held that A was a seaman in the sense of the Act, and appeal dismissed. Thomson v. Hart, Oct. 27, 1890, Just. Cases, p. 3.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Crimes and Offences—Gaming—"Swindler"—Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862, sec. 240.

16. A person was charged upon a complaint, which set forth that he "being a swindler within the meaning of the 240th section of the Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862, was found in a public street exhibiting a wheel of fortune or some similar instrument for the purpose of inducing, and did induce and entice persons to play at a game of hazard." It was proved that the accused had exhibited a wheel of fortune at which eight persons simultaneously staked a penny each, the winner receiving fivepence, and the accused retaining threepence from the stakes as he had previously intimated. The magistrate convicted the accused. In an appeal, held that as there was no evidence that the accused was a swindler the conviction could not be sustained. Melvin v. Lamb, Nov. 3, 1890, Just. Cases, p. 10.

Crimes and offences—Contravention of bye-law of harbour trustees—Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, sec. 93—Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, sec. 83.

17. The Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, by section 93 authorises the harbour trustees to make bye-laws, inter alia, "for regulating the conduct of the owners, masters, and crews of vessels propelled by steam with regard to the rate of speed at which they may proceed within the port and harbours." The Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, sec. 83, provides that harbour trustees may make bye-laws for the purpose of "preventing damage or injury to any vessel or goods within the harbour or dock, or at or near the pier." Greenock Harbour Trustees made a bye-law purporting to regulate the speed of vessels in the fairway of the navigable channel of the River Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works. Held that as the fairway of the navigable channel of the River Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works was not within the harbour, the bye-law was ultra vires of the trustees. Kerr v. Auld, Dec. 19, 1890, Just. Cases, p. 12.

Procedure—Bail—Forgery—Charge admitted in declaration.

18. A person charged with the crime of forgery admitted the charge in his declaration. The Court refused his application for bail, holding that his confession had displaced the presumption of innocence upon which an application for bail is founded. Scott v. Her Majesty's Advocate, Dec. 27, 1890, Just. Cases, p. 15.

Procedure—Competency of leading evidence and convicting of common law offence where statutory offence charged—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 62.

19. Section 62 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, does not entitle the prosecutor to lead evidence to prove facts not libelled in the indictment, and thereafter to convict of a common law offence which had not been charged in the indictment. Markland v. Her Majesty's Advocate, June 8, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 50.

Procedure—Complaint—Specification—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, sec. 49, rule 1.

20. A complaint in the Sheriff Court set forth that J. R. having, on 10th June 1890, been manager of a mine, and as manager having been responsible for the due observance in said mine of rule 1 of section 49 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, "did, time above libelled, fail to constantly produce an amount of ventilation . . . adequate to dilute," &c. (the words of the rule being quoted without further specification), "in consequence whereof an explosion . . . took place in said level, whereby" certain persons were injured, and this J. R. did contrary to the said Act, sec. 49, rule 1. The Sheriff, after a proof, convicted the accused. The Court quashed the conviction on the ground that the complaint upon which it proceeded did not state in what respect the system of ventilation in use in the mine was defective, and that it had been proved that the injuries sustained by the miners had not been caused by anything but their own fault. Roberts v. Atkinson, Nov. 3, 1890, Just. Cases, p. 8.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Procedure—Complaint—Specification—Objection not taken at trial.

21. A person was charged with "an offence within the meaning of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862." There was no specification of the section said to have been contravened, but the acts said to have constituted the contravention were set forth. The accused stated no objection to the complaint in respect of want of specification, and was convicted. In a suspension, the Court, on the ground of want of specification, set aside the conviction, holding that it was incumbent on the prosecutor to set forth the section said to have been contravened as well as the acts said to constitute the contravention. Whyte v. Robertson, July 17, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 56.

Procedure—Certificate—Record—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 16—Infectious Disease (Notification) Act, 1889, sec. 3, subsec. 1 (b).

22. Held that the failure of a magistrate to note in the record of the proceedings at a trial two documents put in evidence was fatal to the conviction which followed. Provan v. Malloch, June 8, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 53.

Procedure—Expenses—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 22—Cruelty to Animals Act, 1850, sec. 8.

23. In a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881, for a penalty incurred by a contravention of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1850, it was held (1) that there was in section 8 of the latter Act an implied power to the Judge in the inferior Court to award expenses against the accused, and therefore, (2) that it was competent to award expenses against the prosecutor. Todrick v. Wilson, March 13, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 41.

LEASE. Constitution—Period of endurance—Validity.

1. In an action praying for the removal of a tenant, on the ground that he had no title of possession, the defender founded on a written lease granted by a former proprietor, in which the term of endurance was mentioned only in a clause added at the end of the testing-clause, and on receipts for rent granted by the landlord, shewing that the defender had been in possession of the subjects. Held that to instruct a valid contract of lease it was sufficient for the defender to prove that the writing had been delivered to him by the landlord in its present form, and that he was entitled to prove this pro ut de jure. Barbour v. Chalmers & Co., March 3, 1891, p. 610.

House rendered uninhabitable owing to mineral workings of persons other than landlord—Reparation.

2. A lease of a house contained a stipulation that the landlord should keep the house wind and water-tight. The house was rendered uninhabitable during the currency of the lease by subsidence caused by the mineral operations of a coal company in the vicinity who were not tenants of the landlord, but who had encroached upon his minerals. The tenant raised an action against the landlord for the damage sustained by the landlord failing to keep the house wind and water-tight. The Court assoilzied the defender, holding that he was not bound to restore the subjects to a habitable condition, and was not liable in damages for failing to do so, the house having been destroyed by the fault of others for whom he was not responsible. Allan v. Roberton's Trustees, June 13, 1891, p. 932.

Power of resumption—Construction—Land and buildings.

3. In 1867 a landlord let to a tenant for nineteen years the farm of G., "with the cothouses and smithy at B." A small portion of the farm, including B., lay to the east of a certain public road. The lease reserved power to the landlord "to resume and take off such parts of the lands hereby let on the east side of" the road as he should think proper, on giving to the tenant certain notice, and allowing him "for the ground so taken off a deduction from the rent at the rate of £6 per acre, besides the value of the unexhausted manure on such land." Upon this detached portion of the farm there were at the date of the lease certain cothouses and a smithy, and soon thereafter the tenant, with the landlord's consent, converted the smithy into a byre, and the landlord built another byre beside the cothouse. Thereafter the tenant sublet the buildings for a dairy. In 1884 the parties agreed to continue the lease, which was about to expire in 1886, upon substantially the same terms. The landlord in 1889 gave notice that he intended to resume the fields to the east of the road in terms of the clause of resumption, and the tenant, while willing to remove from the fields, declined to remove from the buildings. Held that the tenant was bound to remove both from the fields and from the buildings. Trotter v. Torrance, May 27, 1891, p. 848.

LEASE—Continued.

Removing—Process—Appeal—Act 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120, sec. 44.

4. Where a landlord obtained decree of removal against a tenant, on the ground that he had no title to possess, an objection was taken to the competency of an appeal, on the ground that suspension in terms of the 44th section of the Judicature Act was the only competent remedy. Objection repelled. Barbour v. Chalmers & Co., March 3, 1891, p. 610.

Long lease—Valuation of buildings at end of lease—Contract—Construction.

5. A lease of ground with houses thereon for ninety-nine years, inter alia, provided,—"In regard the present houses on the subjects hereby set are in a most ruinous condition, insomuch as to be only proper for a quarry, and as the said" tenant "and his foresaids may during the currency of this lease erect different houses and buildings on these subjects, it is hereby specially agreed upon between the parties that, at the expiry of this tack, the whole houses and buildings then upon the subjects hereby let shall be valued and apprised by two neutral persons, one to be chosen by each party, and, in the case of variance between the said persons, by an oversman to be named by them"; and the landlord bound himself and his foresaids, at the first term of Whitsunday after the expiry of the lease, to pay to the tenant and his foresaids "the one-half of the sums at which the said houses and buildings shall be so valued and apprised in manner above mentioned." Some years after the date of the lease the tenant sublet a portion of the ground, with the houses thereon, to the War Office, and assigned to the subtenant the whole clauses and obligements incumbent on the proprietor under the principal lease. The War Office converted the houses into barracks, and also erected other buildings for the same purpose. At the expiration of the lease the Lord Advocate, for the War Office, brought an action against the proprietor, concluding for decree ordaining the defender to nominate a neutral person in terms of the principal lease, and to pay one-half the value of the buildings when so ascertained. The defender averred that the barracks were not buildings in the sense of the lease, and pleaded that, at all events, the Court ought to instruct the valuers as to the principle of valuation on which they were to proceed. The Court ordained the defender to nominate a neutral person in terms of the lease, and further found that the neutral persons to be appointed were to ascertain to what extent, if any, the value of the lands was enhanced by the existing buildings on the lands. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Home, Jan. 15, 1891, p. 397.

Crofter—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886.

6. In April 1889, by order of the Crofter Commissioners, certain lands—part of a farm held under a lease dated subsequently to the passing of the Crofters Act, 1886—were assigned to certain crofters for the enlargement of their holdings. The landlord and tenant of the farm thereafter brought a suspension and interdict to have the crofters interdicted from entering upon the assigned lands, on the ground that they had no title, not having obtained decree conform to the order from the Sheriff in terms of the Act, and obtained interim interdict. After certain procedure decree conform was pronounced on 3d March 1890, and the interim interdict was recalled. A second note of suspension and interdict against entering the lands was thereafter brought by the landlord and tenant on the ground that the order and all that had followed upon it was ultra vires of the Commissioners, the farm being held under the above lease. In July 1890 the reasons of suspension were repelled. Meantime the tenant had sowed the assigned lands with the necessary seeds for crop 1890. In August 1890 the crofters obtained a decree of ejection against the tenant, and claimed right to the crop sown. In a suspension by the tenant the Court held that in the circumstances the tenant had a right to sow the crop, and that the crop so sown by him belonged exclusively to him. Swanson v. Grieve, Jan. 7, 1891, p. 371.

SE—Continued.
Held that the power conferred on a crofter under section 16 of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, of bequeathing his holding was validly exercised in favour of a niece, although there were in existence sons and daughters of the crofter. M'Lean v. M'Lean, June 10, 1891, p. 885.
Held that a subtenant was not a crofter within the meaning of the Act. Livingstone v. Beattie, March 19, 1891, p. 735.
Held that a person who, between 1885 and 1888, lived at a distance from his holding, visiting it only occasionally for a week or a fortnight at a time to do necessary farm work,—the house being at other times during this period unoccupied,—was not a crofter within the meaning of the Act, in respect that he had not complied with the condition as to residence. Livingstone v. Beattie, March 19, 1891, p. 735.
Action in Court of Session—Application under Crofters Act, 1886. Duke of Sutherland v. Reed, Dec. 18, 1890, p. 252.
ankruptcy of tenant.
Trustee—Adoption of bankrupt's contract of lease—Right in security—Security retenta possessione. M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee, Feb. 27, 1891, p. 576.
RIAGE-CONTRACT. Conveyance by wife—Wife's power over income stante matrimonio.
By antenuptial marriage-contract a wife conveyed her whole estate to trustees, inter alia, for payment to herself of the free income during the marriage, "such payment being made exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration" of her husband, "and her own receipt being a sufficient discharge." The wife became a party to a bond and assignation granted by her husband in security of a loan, binding herself to the extent of her "own separate estate and effects all jointly and severally" to repay it. In answer to an action by the creditors in the bond for payment of the free annual income of the wife's estate, it was pleaded that she could not validly convey it away to her own prejudice stante matrimonio. Held that she had power to make, and had made, an effectual assignation of the income of her estate whether arising during the marriage or after its dissolution. Reliance Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Halkett's Factor, March 4, 1891, p. 615.
onveyance of property "now belonging or which shall belong to the husband at his death."
A conveyance by a husband to his marriage-contract trustees of all property "now belonging or which shall belong to him at the time of his decease," includes only property belonging to him at these dates respectively, and does not deprive him during his life of any right in or control over property acquired after the date of the contract, and such property will be liable for his debts. Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd, July 10, 1891, p. 1121.
Property belonging to the husband"—Spes successionis.
A spes successionis belonging to a husband at the date of his marriage-contract held to be included in a conveyance to the trustees under the contract "of property now belonging to" him, as it appeared from the other parts of the deed that he intended so to convey it. Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd, July 10, 1891, p. 1121.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT—Continued.
Implied exclusion of jus relictæ.
4. Terms of antenuptial marriage-contract, executed abroad in foreign form, between a domiciled Scotsman and a foreign lady, from which it was held that an exclusion of the jus relictæ was to be implied. Durrant Steuart's Trustees v. Durrant Steuart, July 9, 1891, p. 1114.
Postnuptial contract—Revocation.
5. Held on the construction of a postnuptial marriage-contract (1) that the husband's conveyance being a reasonable provision for his wife and children could not be revoked by him or surrendered by his wife; (2) that the wife's conveyance being part of a contract whereby reasonable provisions were made for behoof of herself and the children, if any, she was not entitle to revoke it. Peddie v. Peddie's Trustees, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 491.
Conditio si sine liberis.
6. Question, whether the conditio si sine liberis is applicable to provisions to children in marriage-contracts. Edwardes v. Hughes, Dec. 19, 1890, p. 319.
See Discharge, 2—Entail, 2.

MASTER AND SERVANT. See Reparation, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

MEDITATIO FUGÆ. See Jurisdiction, 2.

MINES AND MINERALS. Right of support—Conveyance of lands reserving the coal—Title—Construction—Extrinsic evidence—Acquiescence.
1. Held, on a construction of a disposition of certain lands under reservation of the minerals, and on a proof of the circumstances as existing at its date, that the disponer must be held to have reserved the right to work the coal in the way in which it was being worked at the date of the disposition, although the result of the working should be to injure the surface, altering interlocutor of Lord Wellwood, Ordinary, who held that, upon the construction of the disposition, the disponer was not entitled to work the minerals so as to bring down the surface, but on the proof that the disponee had acquiesced in his doing so.
Opinions per curiam contra on the question of acquiescence. Bank of Scotland v. Stewart, June 19, 1891, p. 957.
Right to support—Subsidence—Gas pipes belonging to gas company.
2. A gas company entered into an agreement with the proprietor of certain lands to supply his mansion-house with gas, and laid down a branch line of pipes through his lands, it being part of the agreement that the pipes should belong to the company. The proprietor subsequently let the shale in his lands to an oil company, which became bound to pay him for surface and other damage caused by their operations, and to relieve him of all claims against him on account thereof. The result of the operations of the oil company was to cause a subsidence of the ground, which damaged the pipes belonging to the gas company. The gas company, with consent of the proprietor for his right and interest, raised an action against the oil company, praying the Sheriff to ordain them to renew, repair, and relay the pipes. The pursuers did not aver that the defenders had worked the minerals in an improper manner. Held that the defenders were not liable for damage caused by the subsidence, as it was not averred that they had worked the mineral improperly, and as they were under no obligation to the gas company, express or implied, to support the pipes. Mid and East Calder Gas-Light Co. v. Oakbank Oil Co., Limited, March 20, 1891, p. 788.
See Lease, 2.
Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, sec. 13—Check-weigher—Interdict.
3. In a proceeding by the owner of a mine for removal of J. A., a check-weigher, the Court of summary jurisdiction refused to remove him. The owner then dismissed the men employed, but re-engaged them on condition that J. A. should not be re-appointed. The miners did not re-appoint J. A. The owner then brought a process of interdict to have J. A. interdicted from entering his premises. Held that J. A.'s appointment having fallen, interdict must be granted. Merryton Coal Co. v. Anderson, Dec. 9, 1890, p. 203.

MINES AND MINERALS—Continued.

Statutory precautions for safety of mines—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, secs. 49, 51.

4. The rules appended to the above Act provide that (Rule 19) "the top . . . of every . . . shaft shall be properly fenced, but this shall not be taken to forbid the temporary removal of the fence for the purposes of repair or other operations if proper precautions are taken"; and the special rules of a pit, framed under sec. 51 of the Act, provided that the "pitheadman shall see that no rails are laid up to the mouth of the shaft without some provision being made to prevent waggons being pushed into the shaft." At the mouth of a pit which was being sunk to a greater depth there was no fencing, except that there was a moveable wooden block upon the rails leading to the pit mouth, which it was the duty of the pitheadman not to remove unless he was satisfied that the covering table was on the pit mouth. Held that this arrangement was not in breach of the statutory rules. M'Gill v. Bowman & Co., Dec. 9, 1890, p. 206.

See Justiciary Cases, 20.

MINOR AND PUPIL. Pupil with no legal guardian—Custody and education—Nobile officium.

A boy, seven and a-half years of age, whose father resided in India, was placed by his father as a boarder with a friend at Crieff. The father died about six months afterwards, predeceased by his wife, leaving a trust-settlement, in which he gave no directions as to his son's custody, and made no appointment of a tutor. Before his death the father had expressed himself as highly satisfied with the care taken of the boy by his friend at Crieff. A year after the father's death an application was presented to the Court by the boy's paternal grandmother and by his uncles and aunts on both sides, being his nearest relatives, craving that the custody of the boy should be transferred to his grandmother, with whom he had lived before he was sent to Crieff. The Court refused the petition, holding (1) that the petitioners had no legal right to make the demand, and (2) that it would be highly inexpedient in the circumstances for the Court in the exercise of its discretion to interfere with the existing arrangement. Smith v. Smith's Trustees, Dec. 13, 1890, p. 241.

See Judicial Factor, 1, 2, 3, 8.

MORA. See Reparation, 10.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. Property—Title.

1. Where the feudal title to certain heritable subjects stood in the name of an incorporated company which had been dissolved, the trustee appointed in the statutory instrument of dissolution, which gave him power to sell, applied to the Court for authority to execute and deliver dispositions of the heritable subjects which he had sold without completing a feudal title in his person. The Court refused the petition. Campbell, Nov. 21, 1890, p. 149.

Proof.

2. Loss of shorthand writer's notes—Sheriff. Yates v. Robertson, July 18, 1891, p. 1206.

See Minor and Pupil.

PARENT AND CHILD. Paternity—Presumption.

1. Circumstances in which it was held that a husband and wife had failed to displace the presumption of fact that the husband was the father of a child with which his wife was to his knowledge pregnant when he married her. Kerrs v. Lindsay, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 365.

PARENT AND CHILD—Continued.

Father's duty as administrator-in-law of pupil child—Factor loco tutoris.

2. A father presented a petition for the appointment of a factor loco tutoris to his daughter on the ground that the petitioner's interests might conflict with those of his daughter in the prosecution of an action. The Court refused the petition on the ground that the petitioner had failed to shew that any conflict of interests would arise. Cochrane, Jan. 24, 1891, p. 456.

Custody of child—Factor loco tutoris.

3. Circumstances in which authority was granted to a factor loco tutoris to detain the person of his ward in Scotland in opposition to the wishes of the ward's father, who was resident abroad. Moncreiff, July 1, 1891, p. 1029.

Custody of child.

4. Petition by father to recover custody of child from mother—Procedure—Right of access—Expenses—Guardianship of Infants Act, sec. 5. Hutchison v. Hutchison, Dec. 13, 1890, p. 237.

Illegitimate children.

5. The parents of illegitimate children derive no patrimonial rights from their relationship to them. Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co., July 27, 1891, H. L., p. 63.

Solatium and damages—Death of illegitimate child.

6. Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the rule of law which gives to certain relatives of a person killed by the fault of another a right to solatium and damages does not extend to the case of the mother of an illegitimate son. Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co., July 27, 1891, H. L., p. 63.

PARTNERSHIP. Bill of exchange—Charge—Suspension—Caution.

1. One of six partners of a trading firm, which had sold its business to a limited company, granted a promissory-note, to which he signed the firm name as well as his own. The other partners having been charged to pay brought a bill of suspension. The respondents averred that the complainers had adopted the promissory-note. Held that, as the firm's signature could not bind the partners after the dissolution of the firm, and it lay upon the respondents to prove their averments of adoption, the bill should be passed without caution. Goodwin v. Industrial and General Trust, Limited, Dec. 6, 1890, p. 193.

Liability—Firm signature—Bill of exchange.

2. A partner in a firm of builders, who by the contract of copartnery was precluded from signing bills, adhibited the firm name to certain promissory-notes in favour of a money-lender, with whom he discounted them at the rate of 40 per cent per annum. The notes were not granted in the course of the firm's business, and the proceeds were applied to the partner's own use. The firm, having been charged upon the notes, brought a suspension. Held that the loss occasioned by the fraudulent granting of the notes must fall upon the money-lender, who discounted them in suspicious circumstances without inquiry, and not upon the partners of the firm, as they were ignorant of the transaction, and as the transaction was not in the course of the firm's business or for its behoof. Paterson Brothers v. Gladstone, Jan. 15, 1891, p. 403.

Payment of profits to executors of deceased partner for behoof of widow and children—Succession.

3. A contract of copartnery provided that if either of the two partners should die during the continuance of the partnership "leaving a widow, child, or children" surviving him, the surviving partner should, for a period of six months from the date of the deceased partner's death, pay to the latter's executors, "for the benefit of his widow, child, or children, the share of profits to which the said deceased partner would have been entitled had he lived." One of the partners having died leaving a widow and one child, held that the share of the profits payable under the contract of copartnership did not form part of the deceased partner's executry estate, but fell to be equally divided between his wife and child. Adamson's Trustees v. Adamson's Executors, July 14, 1891, p. 1133.

PARTNERSHIP—Continued.
See Judicial Factor, 6.

PAYMENT. Receipt—Discharge—Stamp.
In defence to an action by a widow for certain half-yearly payments of an annuity, to which she was entitled under the will of her husband, his trustees alleged that the pursuer had agreed to hold her maintenance by the liferenter of her deceased husband's estate as equivalent to her annuity for the time, and produced a document titled an "acknowledgment" by her, which set forth certain half-yearly moieties of her annuity, including those sued for, and which concluded,—"I acknowledge that my annuity, as above detailed has been duly accounted for to me by the trustees of the late" husband. It was signed by her, but bore no stamp. Held that the document was of the nature of a receipt, and being unstamped could not be looked at as evidence of the alleged agreement. Cameron v. Panton's Trustees, March 19, 1891, p. 728.

PENALTY. See Contract, 1.

PERSONAL OR TRANSMISSIBLE. Real burden—General conveyance—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 19, schedule L.
By general disposition a testator conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his son, declaring in the dispositive clause that the disposition was granted and was to be accepted under the following burdens, &c., "which are hereby declared to be real burdens on the estate and effects hereby conveyed," . . . inter alia, that the disponee should be bound to pay to a daughter of the testator an annuity of £35. The disponee made up his title to the different parcels of property that had belonged to his father, by notarial instruments in terms of Schedule L of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, each of which set forth the declaration above written at full length, and was duly recorded. Held that the annuity in favour of the daughter had not been validly constituted a real burden. Cowie's Trustees v. Cowie, March 17, 1891, p. 706.

POLICE. Assessment—Construction of Sewers—Purification Works—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 97—Public Health Act, 1867, sec. 94, subsec. 2.
1. In a burgh of under 10,000 inhabitants which had adopted the General Police Act of 1862, the Commissioners of Police introduced a system of public sewers at a cost of over £4000, the proceedings in connection therewith being taken under the Act of 1862. They were subsequently compelled, in order to dispose of the sewage, to undertake the construction of a system of sewage purification and disposal works, and in order to get compulsory powers to acquire the land for this purpose they had, as the Local Authority, to obtain a Provisional Order and a Provisional Order Confirmation Act, in terms of the Public Health Act, 1867. The cost of obtaining the Act and of purchasing the ground and constructing the works was about £19,000. The Commissioners having proposed to raise both sums by assessments on owners under the Police Act of 1862, certain owners contended that the latter sum should be raised, under the Public Health Act, by an assessment upon occupiers. In a special case held that the expenses incurred in the application under the Public Health Act, 1867, fell upon occupiers in terms of sec. 94, subsec. 2, of that Act, there being a police (but no prison) assessment in the burgh, which was so leviable under sec. 84 of the Police Act of 1862. Police Commissioners of Kirkintilloch v. M'Donald, Oct. 31, 1890, p. 67.

Burgh—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 177—Private court —"House."
2. The 177th section of the General Police Act of 1862 provides that it shall not be lawful to build any court of less than a certain specified width, and that "to any such court in which there shall be more than eight houses there shall be an additional width of one foot for every such additional house," and that there shall be an entrance of the full width of the court open from the ground upwards. Held that the section applied to courts to be formed on back-ground exclusively private property. Couper v. Surveyor of Maryhill, March 6, 1891, p. 642.

POLICE—Continued.
See Burgh.

POOR. Settlement—Deserted wife of person having no settlement in Scotland.
1. A widow, who had at one time acquired by her marriage a derivative residential settlement in the parish of D., and had not lost it by absence, obtained parochial relief in that parish. In an action of relief raised by D. against K., the parish of her birth, the pursuer averred that the pauper had lost her derivative settlement in D. by an irregular marriage per verba de presenti with an Englishman who had no settlement in Scotland, that she had been deserted by him, and that she was therefore chargeable to K. as her parish of birth. It was proved that she had gone through an irregular marriage per verba de presenti with a person having no settlement in Scotland, and that subsequently she had left him owing to his carrying on improper intercourse with another woman, and further that he denied that he had ever married her. Held (1) that it was competent for the Sheriff to decide, for the purposes of the action, the question as to the constitution of the irregular marriage; (2) that that marriage being proved, the derivative settlement in D. was lost; (3) that the circumstances of the separation and the denial by the husband that the irregular marriage had been constituted were equivalent to desertion by him; and therefore (4) that the pauper, as the deserted wife of a person having no settlement in Scotland, was chargeable to K., as the parish of her birth. M'Donald v. Mackenzie, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 502.
2. Held that a residential settlement acquired by a Scotswoman was not lost on her marriage to an Irishman who had no settlement in Scotland, and, not having been lost by absence, became available on her becoming a pauper by the desertion of her husband. Reid v. Edmiston, Oct. 28, 1890, p. 25.
3. Special case for the opinion of the Court regarding the liabilities of two parishes in respect to the parochial relief of persons who were resident on a portion of one parish which had under the Local Government Act, 1889, been transferred to the other, dismissed in respect that it presented no question of law. Parochial Board of Borthwick v. Parochial Board of Temple, July 17, 1891, p. 1190.

POSSESSION. See Superior and Vassal, 1, 2.

PRESCRIPTION. Triennial—Mercantile Agency—Act 1579, c. 83.
1. Held that the triennial prescription did not apply to an account for commission charged by a mercantile agent on the purchase of goods wholesale. Brown v. Brown, June 11, 1891, p. 889.
Triennial—Claim for aliment of illegitimate child.
2. A person who was entrusted with the charge of an illegitimate child by the alleged father, sued him for payment of an account for aliment extending over six years—averring a verbal undertaking by him to repay whatever sums might be expended on the aliment and maintenance of the child. It was not alleged that the terms of payment or the amount of the aliment had been fixed, but the account produced charged £4 for each quarter's aliment. Held that as there was no averment of an agreement to make termly payments of aliment the account was to be regarded as a continuous account, and that as three years had not elapsed since the date of the last item, the triennial prescription did not apply. Bracken v. Blasquez, May 13, 1891, p. 819.
Trust—Breach of trust—Deathbed.
3. In 1850 A B disponed on deathbed heritable subjects to which he had merely a personal right, to C D and others, as trustees for behoof of C D in liferent, and E F in fee. C D, who was the truster's heir-at-law, being advised that the conveyance was invalid on the ground of deathbed, and that it was unnecessary for him to reduce it, made up a title in his own person as heir-at-law, and thereafter possessed the subjects for the prescriptive period. At his death he disponed the subjects gratuitously to G H, a singular successor. In an action of declarator and adjudication brought by E F, who claimed to have a right to the subjects under the deathbed deed, against G H, the defender pleaded deathbed. The Court assoilzied the defender, the Lord President, Lord Adam, and Lord Kinnear holding that C D was entitled to complete his title as heir-at-law without regard to the invalid deathbed deed, and that as C D would have been entitled to plead deathbed when it was proponed against him, his disponee, standing on his title, was entitled to do so, Lord M'Laren holding that the defender had a prescriptive title to the lands which was not open to challenge unless his author's title was tainted by breach of trust, and that as his author was entitled to reduce the deathbed conveyance, there was no breach of trust in disregarding it. Thain v. Thain, July 18, 1891, p. 1196.

PRESCRIPTION—Continued.

See Superior and Vassal, 1, 2—Teinds, 3.

PRESUMPTION. See Parent and Child, 1.

PRIVILEGE. See Reparation, 17, 18.

PROCESS. Citation—Statute 1592, cap. 141—Citation Amendment Act, 1882.

1. A service copy of a petition in a Sheriff Court was sent by registered letter to the defender, with a citation bearing in gremio to be executed by A B, a law-agent, but it was not signed by A B, but by C D, another law-agent, for A B. The execution returned upon the petition was in the statutory form, and was signed by A B. In a suspension of a decree in absence obtained against the defender, he pleaded that the citation was invalid. Held that as the execution returned upon the petition had not been reduced, the defender was barred from objecting to the citation. Tait v. Johnston, Feb. 28, 1891, p. 606.

Mandatary.

2. The defender in an action for payment of the aliment of an illegitimate child of which he was alleged to be the father went to Spain, and the Sheriff thereupon ordered him to sist a mandatary. The case having been appealed to the Court of Session, the defender returned to this country and undertook to remain in Scotland until the issue of the action. The Court thereupon recalled the order to sist a mandatary. Bracken v. Blasquez, May 13, 1891, p. 819.
3. Circumstances in which a defender, appellant, who had gone abroad, was not required to sist a mandatary in hoc statu. M'Donald's Trustees v. Stewart, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 491.

See also Justiciary Cases, 9.

Reponing—Decree in absence—Husband and Wife.

4. In an action of separation and aliment by a wife against her husband, the summons was served personally on the defender, and notice of the diet of proof was sent to him by registered letter. He did not lodge defences nor appear at the diet of proof, but decree having been pronounced against him, he lodged a reclaiming note. The pursuer objected to the competency of the reclaiming note and pleaded that the only competent course for the defender was to bring a reduction of the decree. The Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to repone the defender upon such terms as to his Lordship should seem fit. Whyte v. Whyte, Jan. 31, 1891, p. 469.

Amendment—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

5. A tailor in Annan, who was born and received his education in Ayr, brought an action against the Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr for declarator that he was entitled to be admitted a member of the Incorporation as being the son of a member, and averred that by immemorial usage the sons of members were as such entitled to be admitted, although not resident in Ayr. The defenders did not dispute that the pursuer's father had been a member at his death, but denied the averment of usage. The Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders, holding that the averment of usage was not proved. On a reclaiming note the pursuer abandoned the averment of usage, and contended that he was entitled to admission as being a tailor in Scotland, and offered, if necessary, to amend his summons to that effect. Opinion (per Lord President) that the proposed amendment was incompetent, as it would have the effect of converting an action on the pursuer's own account into an action for behoof of the public at large. Loudon v. Tailors of Ayr, Feb. 20, 1891, p. 549.

PROCESS—Continued.

6. After a judgment had been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary against the defenders in an action, certain defenders, after reclaiming, moved the Court to allow them to amend the record to the effect of stating an entirely new defence, on payment of all expenses already incurred in the action. Held (1) that under sec. 29 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, the Court were bound to allow the amendment on such conditions as to the Court should seem proper; and (2) that the amendment should be allowed on payment of the expenses already incurred by the pursuers. Guinness, Mahon, & Co. v. Coats Iron and Steel Co., Jan. 21, 1891, p. 441.

7. Amendment of record, involving considerable alteration of the pleadings or a change of the ground of action, will be allowed in the Inner-House, either in reclaiming notes or in appeals, only on payment of the expenses in the cause from the date of the closing of the record, and the account of expenses must be paid before further hearing by the Court. Morgan, Gellibrand, & Co. v. Dundee Gem Line Steam Shipping Co., Limited, Dec. 9, 1890, p. 205.

Reclaiming—Reclaiming Note without record appended.

8. A reclaiming note against a judgment by a Lord Ordinary sustaining the defenders' pleas, and dismissing an action at the instance of a person who sued in forma pauperis, refused as incompetent, in respect that the record was not appended. M'Evoy v. Braes' Trustees, Jan. 16, 1891, p. 417.

Caution for expenses—Pursuer in receipt of parochial relief.

9. In an action for declarator of property in a Sheriff Court the Sheriff ordained the pursuer, who was in receipt of parochial relief, and who did not apply for the benefit of the poor-roll, to find caution for expenses. Caution not having been found, the Sheriff assoilzied the defender. The pursuer appealed. No appearance was made for the defender, and from the pursuer's statements it seemed that she had acted for some time as proprietor of the subjects. The Court recalled the Sheriff's judgment, and remitted to him to proceed with the cause. Johnstone v. Dryden, Dec. 6, 1890, p. 191.

Proof—Jury trial—Verdict—Contributory negligence—Reparation.

10. In an action of damages for personal injury, the jury returned the following verdict,—"Find for the pursuer, but in respect of there being contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, assess the damages at £300." Held that the verdict being either self-contradictory or ambiguous, could not be applied as a verdict for either party, and that it must therefore be set aside and a new trial granted. Florence v. Mann, Dec. 17, 1890, p. 247.

Proof.

11. Form of commission for the examination of a lunatic in a foreign country. Riddell v. Riddell, Oct. 18, 1890, p. 1.

Loss of shorthand writer's notes. Yates v. Robertson, July 18, 1891, p. 1206.

Declarator—Declarator ab ante.

12. Held that it was competent for a liferenter, who held an estate in liferent under a disposition which provided that his liferent should be forfeited in the event of his selling it, to raise ab ante a declarator of his right to sell without incurring any forfeiture. Chaplin's Trustees v. Hoile, Oct. 30, 1890, p. 27.

PROCESS—Continued.

Special case—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 63.

13. Held that a special case between a limited company and one of its shareholders for the opinion and judgment of the Court upon the question whether special resolutions of the company creating preference shares were ultra vires, was a competent form of process, as the question raised might have been tried between the same parties in another form of process. Ramsbotham v. Scottish American Investment Co., Limited, Feb. 25, 1891, p. 558.

14. Special case for the opinion of the Court regarding the liabilities of two parishes in respect to the parochial relief of persons who were resident on a portion of one parish which had under the Local Government Act, 1889, been transferred to the other dismissed, in respect that it presented no question of law. Parochial Board of Borthwick v. Parochial Board of Temple, July 17, 1891, p. 1190.

Petition—Judicial Factor—Recall—Pupils Protection Act, 1849, secs. 1 and 31—Distribution of Business Act, 1857, sec. 4, subsec. 5.

15. Held (after consultation with the Judges of the First Division) that a petition for recall of the appointment of a curator bonis and for appointment of a new curator bonis is incompetent in the Inner-House, and must be presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary. Souter v. Finlay, Nov. 8, 1890, p. 86.

Proving of tenor—Untested deed—No written adminicles—Parole evidence.

16. In an action of proving the tenor, the pursuer sought to set up a deed by which he alleged that the defender had, during his lifetime, conveyed away from himself certain property absolutely to A, his deceased wife's sister, with whom he lived as his wife, whose heir-at-law the pursuer was. No draft or other written adminicle was produced, and the deed libelled in the summons as the deed to be set up was undated, unsubscribed, and untested. The casus amissionis alleged was that the granter had destroyed the deed while it was in his possession. The pursuer adduced parole proof, and the only material evidence was that of a solicitor who deponed that the deed had been fifteen years before the date of the proof, and some years after its execution, submitted to him for his opinion as to its effect, and while he was unable to speak to its terms, his impression, derived from entries in his ledger, was that it was or must have been an absolute inter vivos deed in favour of A and her heirs. The defender, while admitting that he had destroyed a deed in favour of A, deponed that it was mortis causa and undelivered. Held that the pursuer had failed to prove his case. Rannie v. Ogg, June 12, 1891, p. 903.

Appeal—Sheriff—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 40—Act of Sederunt, 11*th July* 1828, sec. 5.

17. A Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof on 2d April. On 21st May he sisted the process for a month on the motion of the defender. The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff-principal, who, on 5th June, recalled the sist, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to fix a new diet of proof. On 15th June the latter fixed a new diet of proof. On 16th June the defender appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial. Held (diss. Lord Young) that the appeal was incompetent under section 5 of A. S., 11th July 1828, as the only interlocutor allowing a proof was that of 2d April, and no appeal had been presented within fifteen days thereafter. Kinnes v. Fleming, Jan. 15, 1881, 8 R. 386, and Williams v. Watt & Wilson, May 28, 1889, 16 R. 687, followed. Davidson v. Davidson's Executor, July 7, 1891, p. 1069.

Appeal—Sheriff—33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86, secs. 12 and 13.

18. The Sheriff-substitute of a county divided into two districts by an order of a Secretary of State following on the Statute 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86, refused a warrant to cite to the Court at the head burgh of the county a defender belonging to another district of the county. Held that an appeal against this refusal was incompetent. Davidson v. Davidson, June 9, 1891, p. 884.

Appeal—Sheriff—Local Government Act, 1889, secs. 86, 105.

19. The Local Government Act, 1889 (sec. 86), enacts that if under the provisions thereof a teacher appointed previously to the passing of the Education Act, 1872, shall be prejudiced in his right to school fees, he shall be entitled to compensation from the school board, "and such compensation, failing agreement, may be determined finally by the Sheriff." In an action brought in the Sheriff Court by a teacher against a school board praying for declarator that the pursuer was entitled to a certain sum annually as compensation for fees under the above Act, the Sheriff-substitute appointed the pursuer to lodge a minute giving details as to fees previously received by him. The pursuer having appealed, the Sheriff allowed the pursuer a proof. The defenders appealed to the Court of Session. Held that the appeal was incompetent. M'Gilp v. Kilchoman School Board, March 17, 1891, p. 714.

PROCESS—Continued.

Appeal—Competency—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 170.

20. In a petition in the Sheriff Court by a bankrupt for discharge, the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor of 1st October 1890, found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge and appointed him to make a declaration in terms of the statute. Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor of 10th October, found the declaration made by the bankrupt satisfactory, and discharged him. On 15th October an objecting creditor appealed under the 170th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856. Held that although the appeal was competent as an appeal against the interlocutor of 10th October, it did not also submit to review the prior interlocutor of 1st October, which was a substantive judgment, and had become final as not having been appealed against within the period prescribed by the Act. Alison v. Robertson's Trustees, Dec. 9, 1890, p. 212.

Appeal—Removing—Act 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120, sec. 44.

21. Where a landlord obtained decree of removal against a tenant, on the ground that he had no title to possess, an objection was taken to the competency of an appeal, on the ground that suspension in terms of the 44th section of the Judicature Act was the only competent remedy. Objection repelled. Barbour v. Chalmers & Co., March 3, 1891, p. 610.

Appeal—Dean of Guild—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 273 and 277.

22. Held that a petition for a lining presented to the Dean of Guild of Glasgow was a common law proceeding, and that his judgment thereon, without a record having been made up, was not excluded from review by the Glasgow Police Act, 1866. Allan v. Whyte, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 332.

23. Interlocutor which was held to be in pursuance of the Act, and consequently to be unappealable, no record having been made up. Walker v. Lang, June 13, 1891, p. 928.

Appeal—Competency—Dean of Guild.

24. An interlocutor by a Dean of Guild refusing to sist as respondent a person who alleges a material interest to appear in a petition for authority to take down and rebuild a house is a final interlocutor quoad that person, and therefore appealable. Lawrie v. Jackson, July 15, 1891, p. 1154.

Appeal—Licensing Courts—Certificate.

25. The only appeal from a decision of the Justices of the Peace granting or refusing a public-house licence is to Quarter Sessions, and it is incompetent to bring a reduction of a decision of the Justices refusing a licence on the ground that evidence was improperly admitted or refused, or on any ground except that of excess of jurisdiction. Lundie v. Magistrates of Falkirk, Oct. 31, 1890, p. 60.

See Sale, 7.

PROOF. Admissibility of plan—Property—Marches.

1. Plan which was held to be competent evidence in a dispute as to marches between two landowners. Reid v. Haldane's Trustees, March 19, 1891, p. 744.

Lease—Constitution—Period of endurance—Validity.

2. In an action praying for the removal of a tenant, on the ground that he had no title of possession, the defender founded on a written lease granted by a former proprietor, in which the term of endurance was mentioned only in a clause added at the end of the testing-clause, and on receipts for rent granted by the landlord shewing that the defender had been in possession of the subjects. Held that to instruct a valid contract of lease it was sufficient for the defender to prove that the writing had been delivered to him by the landlord in its present form, and that he was entitled to prove this pro ut de jure. Barbour v. Chalmers & Co., March 3, 1891, p. 610.

OOF—Continued.

Confidential report by police inspector to procurator-fiscal.
In an action of damages for wrongous apprehension against an inspector of police, held that the pursuers were not entitled to recover confidential reports made by the inspector to the procurator-fiscal. Hastings v. Chalmers, Dec. 16, 1890, p. 244.

Ambiguity—Decree of presbytery.
Terms of decree of a presbytery defining the boundaries of a glebe in an excambion, which held (aff. judgment of Second Division), to be unambiguous. Minister of Lochlee v. Dalhousie's Tutors, June 19, 1891, H. L., p. 72.

See Bill of Exchange, 3—Discharge, 2—Judicial Factor, 5—Mines and Minerals, 1—Process, 10, 11—Property, 2—Sheriff, 5.

OPERTY. Nobile officium—Title.
Where the feudal title to certain heritable subjects stood in the name of an incorporated company which had been dissolved, the trustee appointed in the statutory instrument of dissolution, which gave him power to sell, applied to the Court for authority to execute and deliver dispositions of the heritable subjects which he had sold without completing a feudal title in his person. The Court refused the petition. Campbell, Nov. 21, 1890, p. 149.

Proof—Marches—Admissibility of plan as evidence.
In a dispute in 1889 as to marches between two landowners, whose lands had at one time formed parts of the same barony, the pursuer tendered as evidence a plan bearing the date 1842. It had been found in the possession of a third person, owner of another part of the original barony, who had at one time had a claim over the disputed ground identical with the claims of the pursuer, who had bought up his rights. It was not known on whose instructions or for what purpose the plan had been made. It had at one time passed with the titles of the defenders' predecessors, and a copy of it had been used by them in connection with a projected sale of their lands. Held that it was competent evidence. Reid v. Haldane's Trustees, March 19, 1891, p. 744.

"Right and privilege"—Superior and Vassal—Subject feued—Jus quæsitum tertio—Res inter alios acta.
On 19th August 1723 the proprietor of the barony of Struie granted feus of four portions thereof to different persons,—(1) The wester half of Mains of Struie, with the privileges and haill pertinents thereof as marched from the other half, "with half of the right and privilege of the loan leading to and from that hill belonging to the haill Mains of Struie called Douchrie," about 600 yards distant, "according as the said loan lies meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and Baulk of Struie." (2) The easter half of Mains of Struie described in the same way, mutatis mutandis. (3) Whitehill, "reserving the loan belonging to the Mains of Struie leading to the hill of the said Mains called Dochrie, as the said loan lies and is meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and lands of Baulk of Struie from Powstink to the Overnook of Tamacreich Dyke, in which space the said loan is not to be cast upon by the possessors of Mains of Struie." (4) Baulk of Struie, "reserving the loan belonging to Mains of Struie, which leads to the hill of the said mains, . . . all along, as the said loan lies meithed and marched betwixt the said lands of Baulk and Whitehill of Struie." In 1889 the proprietors of the wester half of Mains of Struie, who had also acquired right from the proprietor of the easter half to the latter's right to the hill of Dochrie, and to the loan, brought an action against the proprietor of Whitehill and Baulk for declarator that the pursuer had the right of property in the loan. The defender maintained that it belonged to himself, or alternatively to the superior, who, however, had no right of access to the loan. There was no trustworthy evidence of possession, the whole lands having been possessed together in tenancy for upwards of forty years. Held on a construction of the titles, aided by an estate plan dated in 1842, which shewed Whitehill and Baulk as non-contiguous, and included the loaning within the boundary lines of Struie and Dochrie (1) that it was not to be presumed that the property in the loaning had been retained by the superior; (2) that the property in the loaning had not been given out to Whitehill and Baulk; and (3) that the phrase "right and privilege" was sufficient to carry it with Mains of Struie. Reid v. Haldane's Trustees, March 19, 1891, p. 744.

PROPERTY—Continued.

Tenement in burgh—Conveyance of attic story—Right to roof.

4. A, the proprietor of a building feu within burgh, having built thereon a tenement of houses, disponed to B "these two dwelling-houses or flats, being the second flat above the shops and the attic story of the tenement with two cellars, a necessary-house, and a right to the water-pipe in common with the other proprietors, under burden of payment of one shilling of feu-duty, and a fourth part of the expense of upholding the roof of the said tenement." Other flats were disponed to other persons in terms mutatis mutandis identical with the above, but the granters retained part of the basement and of the upper flats in their own hands. A disponee of B to the attic flat presented a petition to the Dean of Guild for authority to convert the attic flat into a square story, and to build another story above it. A opposed the petition. The Court refused the petition, in respect (1) that as a question of contract each buyer from A obtained right only to the parts of the tenement as described in his disposition, and the claim of the petitioner amounted to a claim to more than that; and (2) that as a question of real right A, the proprietor of the solum on which the tenement was built, had not conveyed to B the right of indefinite extension upward, but only the right to the stratum of space occupied by the attic story. Watt v. Burgess' Trustee, March 19, 1891, p. 766.

See Fishings, 2.

PROVING OF TENOR. See Process, 16—Title to Sue, 4.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, sec. 30 (7)—Compensation for slaughtered animals—Local Authority.

Held that under the above Act to justify a Local Authority in withholding compensation for an animal slaughtered it is necessary that they should ascertain and determine that the offence has been committed, and that such determination should be recorded in the minutes, and that it is not necessary that the outbreak of disease should be traceable to the offence. Calder v. Local Authority of Linlithgow, Oct. 30, 1890, p. 48.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Hotel—Tippling Act, sec. 12.

1. Opinions that the 12th section of the Tippling Act does not apply to the case of a guest resident in a hotel who during his stay is supplied from time to time with small quantities of spirituous liquors for his own use and that of friends. Guthrie's Trustees v. Ireland, May 22, 1891, p. 833.

Appeal—Licensing Courts—Certificate

2. The only appeal from a decision of the Justices of the Peace granting or refusing a public-house licence is to Quarter Sessions, and it is incompetent to bring a reduction of a decision of the Justices refusing a licence on the ground that evidence was improperly admitted or refused, or on any ground except that of excess of jurisdiction. Lundie v. Magistrates of Falkirk, Oct. 31, 1890, p. 60.

Administration of justice—Justice of Peace—Licensing Court—Statute 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 13.

3. Held that a Justice of the Peace was not disqualified from sitting on the bench of Justices for the granting of licences under the 13th section of the Home Drummond Act, 1828, by reason of the fact that he was trustee

c-House—Continued.
ıpon a sequestrated estate, part of which consisted of a public-house busi-ıess. Lundie v. Magistrates of Falkirk, Oct. 31, 1890, p. 60.
ıinistration of justice—Second trial where conviction on first trial "null oid"—7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53, sec. 68.
. person was convicted before two Justices of retailing spirits without hav-ng a licence. One of the Justices was a person employed in the collection f certain duties of excise, and the proceedings were therefore declared by
ec. 68 of the above Act to be utterly null and void to all intents and puroses. On the attention of the prosecutor being called to this fact he epaid the penalty which had been imposed in respect of the conviction.
A new complaint for the same offence was brought, and a conviction again ollowed, in spite of a plea that this second proceeding was incompetent.
An appeal having been taken to the Quarter Sessions against the second onviction, a case was stated for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer. Held that a decree by a competent Court was necessary to leclare the statutory nullity, that the Justices had no jurisdiction to pro-ıounce any such decree, were not at liberty to disregard the fact of a coniction having been already obtained for the same offence, and therefore ould not entertain the second complaint. M'Intosh v. Waite, Feb. 27, 891, p. 583.

c Officer. Reparation—Statutory protection against claims of damages or irregularities in execution of office —Ultra vires—Public Health (Scot-and) Act, 1867, sec. 118.
Where a Local Authority had partly demolished an untenanted house within heir district on the ground that the state of the roof was dangerous to ıublic safety, held that the local authority were not protected by the 118th ection of the Public Health Act, 1867, against a claim for damages by the ıwner, the demolition of houses on account of their danger to public safety ıeing outwith the powers of Local Authorities under the Act. Edwards v.
Parochial Board of Kinloss, June 2, 1891, p. 867.
ıof—Confidential report by police inspector to procurator-fiscal.
n an action of damages for wrongous apprehension against an inspector of ıolice, held that the pursuers were not entitled to recover confidential eports made by the inspector to the procurator-fiscal. Hastings v. Chalmers, Dec. 16, 1890, p. 244.
ı Reparation, 23, 24.

ıay. Rates—Preference—Agreements and contracts.
. railway company agreed with a coalmaster to carry his coals to Ayr at he following lump rates:—From A (two miles) at 6d. per ton, from B six miles), from C (seven miles), and from D (eight miles) at 8d. per ton; ınd that in the event of the railway company carrying coals to Ayr for ıny other coalmaster at lower rates it should be bound to reduce the rates ınder the agreement to those lower rates. In an action raised by the coal-naster for repayment of alleged overcharges the pursuer averred that the ailway company had been carrying coals to Ayr from the L. colliery, twentyhree miles distant, for 1s. 7d. per ton, being a rate under 1d. per ton per nile, while the pursuer had been paying, in terms of the agreement, on coals arried from the D pit to Ayr 1d. per mile, and from the B and C pits a ıigher rate per mile. Held that the rates fixed by the agreement were lump ates not based on considerations of mileage alone, but graduated according o distance, a higher rate per mile being charged for short distances than or long distances, and that therefore it did not appear from the pursuers' tatement that the rates charged against the L. colliery for carriage for wenty-three miles were lower rates than those charged against the pursuers or short distances, and action dismissed as irrelevant. Taylor & Co. v.
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., July 3, 1891, p. 1031.
rriage of passengers—Expulsion of passenger.
he servant of a railway company who has, without taking any objection,

RAILWAY—Continued.

accepted from one of the passengers in a railway carriage tickets as for all the occupants of that carriage, is not entitled, on discovering that one of these tickets is defective, to remove from the carriage the person from whom he had so accepted the tickets and treat him as if he had been the holder of the defective ticket. Harris v. North British Railway Co., June 30, 1891, p. 1009.

Common carriers—Haulage contract—Liability for loss of traders' waggons.

3. A railway company conveyed a trader's waggons containing coal along their lines, and after delivery of the coal conveyed the empty waggons back to the collieries, the sole charge made being a rate of 1s. 7½d. per ton, whereas the rate for the conveyance of coal on waggons belonging to the company was 2s. On the return journey some of the waggons were destroyed through an accident to the train caused by a latent defect in the waggon of another trader, which was in the same train. Held that the railway company were not liable for the safe delivery of the waggons as under a contract of carriage. Barr & Sons v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 21, 1890, p. 139.

Running powers—Use of joint station—Act 29 and 30 Vict. cap. cccl.

4. In 1864 the Scottish North-Eastern and the Great North of Scotland Railway Companies built a joint station at Aberdeen, which was by statute declared to be their joint property. It was provided that the control and management of it should be in a joint committee of the two companies. The Scottish North-Eastern Company with "all the rights, interests, and estate" which it possessed, was afterwards transferred by the Act 29 and 30 Vict. cap. cccl. to the Caledonian Railway Company. The 99th section of the Act, after reciting that the railways of the North British Company formed, with other railways, lines of communication between London and Scotland, &c., and that it was expedient that free and expeditious transit of traffic over the said lines of communication should be secured, enacted that the expression "Scottish East Coast traffic," as used in the Act, should mean traffic of every description on the Scottish North-Eastern line from or to any place on or beyond and via the North British lines. And by the 106th section of the same statute it was provided that "the North British Railway Company may, for the purpose of conveying Scottish East Coast traffic, run over and use with their engines, trucks, and carriages of every description, the Scottish North-Eastern lines, or any part thereof, and the stations, watering-places, works, and conveniences upon and connected with the Scottish North-Eastern lines." Further, the North British Railway were to be entitled to "the joint or separate use of the offices, warehouses, stations, sidings, and other accommodation at the several stations, wharfs, stopping, loading, and unloading places, sidings, and junctions of the Scottish North-Eastern lines, including, in so far as the company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen, and all conveniences therewith connected. . . ." After the North British Railway had been for some years admitted to the station, and had enjoyed its conveniences for their traffic, an action was brought by the Joint Committee and the Great North of Scotland Company for declarator that the North British Company had no right, without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Company, to use the station, and for interdict. Held that, the object of the Legislature having been to give every possible facility for the passage of Scottish East Coast traffic upon the lines in question, the North British Company were entitled not only to running powers through the station at Aberdeen, but also to the use of the station itself, and all the conveniences and privileges connected therewith, in so far as these were enjoyed by the Caledonian Company. Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co., May 28, 1891, p. 855.

Invitation to passenger to alight—Reparation—Contributory negligence.

5. In an action of damages against a railway company raised by a passenger for injuries received in alighting at night from a train at a railway station—

RAILWAY—Continued.

not a terminus—it was proved that the train was of an unusual length, that the last carriage, in which the pursuer was travelling, was stopped opposite the end of the platform, which sloped down to the level of the rails; that the pursuer had failed to observe this when she stepped out of the carriage. The guard deponed that he had shouted to the passengers to keep their seats before the pursuer left the carriage, but in this he was contradicted. The jury found for the pursuer. In a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence, held (1) that in the circumstances it was the duty of the defenders to have given warning to the passengers to keep their seats; and (2) that the question whether they gave such warning or not was one for the jury. Aitken v. North British Railway Co., May 22, 1891, p. 836.

See Discharge, 3.

REAL BURDEN. See Personal and Transmissible.

RECEIPT. See Payment.

REDUCTION. See Bankruptcy, 5—Company, 4—Error—Succession, 31—Title to Sue, 4.

REPARATION. Contributory negligence—Process—Jury trial—Verdict.

1. In an action of damages for personal injury the jury returned the following verdict,—"Find for the pursuer, but in respect of there being contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, assess the damages at £300." Held that the verdict being either self-contradictory or ambiguous, could not be applied as a verdict for either party, and that it must therefore be set aside and a new trial granted. Florence v. Mann, Dec. 17, 1890, p. 247.

Contributory negligence—Railway—Invitation to passenger to alight.

2. In an action of damages against a railway company raised by a passenger for injuries received in alighting at night from a train at a railway station—not a terminus—it was proved that the train was of an unusual length, that the last carriage, in which the pursuer was travelling, was stopped opposite the end of the platform, which sloped down to the level of the rails; that the pursuer had failed to observe this when she stepped out of the carriage. The guard deponed that he had shouted to the passengers to keep their seats before the pursuer left the carriage, but in this he was contradicted. The jury found for the pursuer. In a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence, held (1) that in the circumstances it was the duty of the defenders to have given warning to the passengers to keep their seats; and (2) that the question whether they gave such warning or not was one for the jury. Aitken v. North British Railway Co., May 22, 1891, p. 836.

Lease—House rendered uninhabitable owing to mineral workings of persons other than landlord.

3. A lease of a house contained a stipulation that the landlord should keep the house wind and water-tight. The house was rendered uninhabitable during the currency of the lease by subsidence caused by the mineral operations of a coal company in the vicinity who were not tenants of the landlord, but who had encroached upon his minerals. The tenant raised an action against the landlord for the damage sustained by the landlord failing to keep the house wind and water-tight. The Court assoilzied the defender, holding that he was not bound to restore the subjects to a habitable condition, and was not liable in damages for failing to do so, the house having been destroyed by the fault of others for whom he was not responsible. Allan v. Roberton's Trustees, June 13, 1891, p. 932.

Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880.

4. In an action of damages raised by a labourer against his employer, a contractor, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the pursuer alleged that in the course of working as a labourer at the demolition of an old building he fell by part of one of the floors giving way and received injuries, that he had been employed at the work under the direction and superintendence of a foreman, to whose orders he was bound to conform, that he had been ordered by him to go upon a floor which was weak through age and decay, and through the removal in the course of the work of certain supports, that he met with the accident by conforming to this order, and that the pursuer was not aware of the danger he incurred by obeying this order, that the foreman was grossly negligent in giving the order to go upon the floor, which he knew or ought to have known was dangerous without guarding against accident, or enabling the pursuer to guard against it, and that the foreman was quite incompetent to be left in charge of the work, and that his want of skill caused or contributed to the accident. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue. Flynn v. M'Gaw, Feb. 21, 1891, p. 555.

REPARATION—Continued.

5. In an action of damages against a firm of contractors by the representatives of a labourer who had been killed in the course of his employment, the pursuers averred that the deceased had, along with other labourers, and "under instructions and superintendence of one of the defenders' foremen," been engaged in working in or about a large drain, that the said foreman was a person whose orders the deceased was bound to obey, and for whom the defenders were responsible under the Employers Liability Act, 1880; that the drain was from 7 to 10 feet in depth, and that while the deceased was working at the foot of it, ten feet of the side fell in, and injured him so that he died; that the accident was due to the fault of the defender or of their foreman in causing the deceased to work in the drain without first sufficiently propping its sides with wood; that the duty of seeing that the sides of the drain were sufficiently propped lay with the defenders or their foreman and not with the deceased or his fellow-workmen, and that the deceased relied, and was entitled to rely, on the defenders or their foreman attending to this duty. The pursuer pleaded the common law and sec. 1, subsecs. 1, 2, and 3, of the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue. M'Coll v. Black & Eadie, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 507.

6. In an action of damages raised by an engineer against his employers, a firm of shipbuilders and engineers, the pursuer averred that he had been employed in fitting up the boilers in a steamer which had been constructed by his employers, and was in course of completion; that he was in the habit of going to his work by the forward hatch, but as this passage was blocked he had, on one occasion, to proceed by the after hatch and through the engine-room; that in doing so he fell into a manhole in the floor of the engine-room and was injured; that the manhole was unprotected, except for some lead pipes which were lying on one side of it; that he was unaware of its existence, as it had been covered over on the only two occasions on which he had previously been in the engine-room; that at the time of the accident the light in the engine-room was dim; that there was a duty on the defenders to cover or protect the manhole so as to prevent accidents, but that they had failed to do so, although similar occurrences had taken place before; that it was the duty of the defenders to have had the engine-room properly lighted; and that their failure in these respects had led to the accident. Held that, having regard to the circumstances stated, there was no relevant averment of fault on the part of the defenders, and action dismissed. Forsyth v. Ramage & Ferguson, Oct. 25, 1890, p. 21.

7. In an action of damages raised by a labourer against his employer at common law, and alternatively under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the pursuer alleged that he was in the course of his duty, at two o'clock on the morning of 27th March, uncoupling waggons filled with shale, which had been propelled by an engine along a line of railway belonging to the defenders, and that while he was between two of the waggons the engine-driver returned with the engine, and drove it suddenly, without warning, culpably, and carelessly, against these waggons, by reason of which a waggon went over the pursuer's leg; that at the place where the accident happened there was a hole several feet deep and two feet wide under the railway lines, which ought to have been covered with planks, at least during the night, and that the pursuer, notwithstanding the want of warning, would probably have escaped but for said hole; that one of his feet slipped into it, and that he was thereby unable to get his other foot clear in time. Held that, as according to the pursuer's statement, it was the engine-driver's breach of duty that caused the accident at the particular place, there was no relevant case at common law against the defenders. Robertson v. Linlithgow Oil Co., Limited, July 18, 1891, p. 1221.

Mine—Workman in employment of separate contractor—Materials supplied by employer to contractor.

8. A miner in the employment of a person who had contracted with a coalmaster for the sinking of a pit was killed by the fall of a "kettle" used in raising material. The kettle and all the appliances connected with it were supplied by the coalmaster under a written contract, which provided, "the contractor to pay his own pitheadmen, and take upon himself the responsibility of their conduct when at work, and any accident that may befall them in the execution of his orders. He must therefore satisfy himself as to the condition and strength of all materials and tackling provided for him, it being understood that he may stop work till the necessary alterations or repairs are made." In an action at the instance of the representatives of the miner against the coalmaster it was proved that the plant supplied by the defender was reasonably safe and sufficient, though somewhat old-fashioned, and not provided with recent improvements, which would have rendered the accident impossible; further, that the accident occurred through the neglect of the contractor's pitheadman. Held that the defender was not responsible. M'Gill v. Bowman & Co., Dec. 9, 1890, p. 206.

Precautions for the safety of the public—Railway—Escape of dog entrusted for carriage.

9. In an action of damages against a railway company by a man who had been bitten by a dog which had escaped from the custody of the company, the following facts were proved:—The dog, with a collar and chain attached, was delivered to the railway company at Kelso for carriage to Perth, the guard being told that it was a quiet animal. At Waverley Station, Edinburgh, where it had an hour and a-half to wait in the parcel-office during change of train, it seemed to get excited, and snapped at its chain. On being led out to rejoin the train it at first went quietly, but soon shewed a disposition to bite, and finally broke away from the porter who was leading it, and escaped from the station. It found its way to a public garden at some distance, where it was secured by the pursuer and two other gardeners, and left in the charge of the pursuer, when it bit him. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer. The Court granted a new trial, on the ground that there was no evidence of fault on the part of the railway company in permitting the dog to escape. Gray v. North British Railway Co., Nov. 4, 1890, p. 76.

Promise to marry—Mora—Acquiescence.

10. In an action of damages raised in 1889 for breach of a promise to marry alleged to have been made in 1879, the defender admitted the promise, but pleaded that the pursuer's claim was barred by mora and acquiescence. It was proved before a jury that from 1881 till the raising of the action, the pursuer, though living in the same town as the defender, had hardly ever spoken to the defender, and when passing him in the street simply recognised him; but, in 1885, hearing that he was engaged to another woman (whom he married in 1889), she wrote to her intimating her prior engagement. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer. On a motion for a new trial, the Court refused to disturb the verdict. Colvin v. Johnstone, Nov. 14, 1890, p. 115.

REPARATION—Continued.

Public official—Statutory protection against claims of damages for irregularities in execution of office—Ultra vires—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 118.

11. Where a Local Authority had partly demolished an untenanted house within their district on the ground that the state of the roof was dangerous to public safety, held that the Local Authority were not protected by the 118th section of the Public Health Act, 1867, against a claim for damages by the owner, the demolition of houses on account of their danger to public safety being outwith the powers of Local Authorities under the Act. Edwards v. Parochial Board of Kinloss, June 2, 1891, p. 867.

Slander—Issue—Justification.

12. In an action of damages for slander in respect that the defender had, as was alleged, called the pursuer "a swindler and a thief," "a questionable character," and a person whose "presence was an offence to all honourable men," the defender admitted having said that the pursuer's conduct "was little removed from thieving," but stated in justification that the pursuer and other persons had purchased certain concessions entitling them to work copper mines at Val d'Elsa, Italy, and that the pursuer, though knowing that the prospects of return therefrom were extremely discouraging, had "made false and fraudulent representations to the defender regarding a proposed joint stock company to be formed to take over certain mineral concessions in the Val d'Elsa, Italy, by representing the mines to be of great value, which, in point of fact, he knew they were not, and thus induced the defender to contribute to the capital of the Val d'Elsa Copper Company, in the promotion of which the pursuer was pecuniarily interested as vendor"; that the pursuer further stated that the run by the public upon the shares had been so great that it would be necessary for the defender to take more shares in order to make sure of an allotment, and in reliance upon the truthfulness and accuracy of this, along with the other representations of the pursuer, the defender was induced to take additional shares, while the fact was that only about 25,000 of the 60,000 shares offered to the public were applied for; that the pursuer as vendor was dependent for the carrying out of the sale on a sufficient number of shares being applied for. The Court allowed the defender issues in justification. Macleod v. Marshall, March 20, 1891, p. 811.

Slander—Newspaper—Innuendo.

13. A newspaper published a report of a meeting of a Good Templar Lodge, headed "Mr A.'s Crooked Ways." It was set out in the report that "Brother H.," who had been a candidate for the Grand Chiefship, stated that "Brother A." came to him and urged him to become a candidate, as he had no intention of standing again for the post; that subsequently, without giving him, "Brother H.," any notice of his change of mind, "Brother A." presented himself as a candidate, and was re-elected; and that he, Brother H., felt justified in making these explanations, as his conduct in opposing Brother A. was apt to be misunderstood. The same issue of the paper contained a short leading article, which substantially repeated the statement attributed to "Brother H." in the report, and added,—"It is to be hoped that this sharp practice, which is of a piece with the other proceedings of the official clique at the head of the Order, will not be lost upon the members." The news-bill of the day also contained the words,—"Mr A. and his Crooked Ways." In an action by A. against the proprietors of the newspaper for slander, alleged to be contained in the above publications, which were innuendoed to mean that the defenders intended to represent, and did represent, that the pursuer had been guilty of deceitful and dishonourable conduct, and that he habitually indulged in conduct that was unfair, deceitful, and dishonourable, the Court held (rev. judgment of Lord Wellwood) that the publications would not bear the innuendo proposed, and assoilzied the defenders. Archer v. Ritchie & Co., March 19, 1891, p. 719.

REPARATION—Continued.

Slander—Malice—Statement regarding candidate for county council by one not a voter in the district.

14. Where a parish was divided into two electoral divisions for county council purposes, and a voter in one division was sued by a candidate for the other for damages for falsely and calumniously stating that it would be useless to elect the pursuer as he would soon be bankrupt, held that the defender was not privileged, and that malice need not be put in the issue. Anderson v. Hunter, Jan. 30, 1891, p. 467.

Slander—Issue.

15. Form of issue where slander is said to have been uttered in Gaelic. Anderson v. Hunter, Jan. 30, 1891, p. 467.

Slander—Innuendo—Threat to report matter to procurator-fiscal.

16. In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that his firm of Ramsay Brothers had been in the practice of collecting accounts for the firm of MacLay & Co., of which also he had formerly been a partner; that he had sold his interest in the latter firm to the other partners on 4th April 1889; that on 28th December 1888, and on 5th March 1889, the cashier of Ramsay Brothers had collected two accounts due to MacLay & Co. by a customer for £5, 5s. and £4, 4s. respectively, and that these sums had been credited to MacLay & Co.; that Ramsay Brothers had been sequestrated on 6th May 1889; that on 20th February 1890 the defenders had written to the pursuer—"We are surprised at having had no reply to ours of the 3d inst., regarding the a/cs of Wilson, Saline, which you collected and have not accounted for. It seems to us you do not realise the seriousness of your position in the matter, but should we be forced to insist on Mrs Wilson paying us the accounts she has already paid to you, and which is quite within our right, as she holds no receipt from us, and those she had from you are no legal discharge of a/cs due to MacLay & Co., she threatens to place the affair in the hands of her law-agent, and you may then find yourself in an awkward situation, as he will in all probability report to the fiscal. If you wish to save yourself from unpleasant consequences you will let us hear from you without delay"; that by this letter the defenders had falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represented that the pursuer, without any authority from MacLay & Company, had collected money due by a customer to them, and had dishonestly appropriated the same, or part thereof, to his own purposes, and been guilty of breach of trust and embezzlement. The pursuer did not deny on record the liability of his firm to account, or their failure to do so, and, although allowed delay in order to explain what had become of the money, intimated that he had no explanation to give. Held (1) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue, and (2) that the word "maliciously" should not be inserted in the issue. Ramsay v. MacLay & Co., Nov. 18, 1890, p. 130.

Slander—Privilege—Privilege of litigant in stating matter pertinent to action.

17. In an action by a tenant against his landlord for damages for breach of contract in taking possession before the expiration of the lease of the shop let to the pursuer, the defender inter alia averred that the tenant had gone to England, and had left the shop in charge of J. S., that J. S. "was seldom sober" during the time he was on the premises. In an action of damages for slander raised by J. S. against the landlord, held that the defamatory statement made by the landlord in the other action being pertinent to the cause was privileged, and that as the pursuer had failed to set forth facts from which malice could be inferred the action fell to be dismissed. Selbie v. Saint, Nov. 8, 1890, p. 88.

Slander—Innuendo—Privilege—Issue.

18. In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that he had let a cutting machine on hire to W., and that on W. becoming insolvent, and granting a trust-deed, he (the pursuer) had removed the machine from his premises; that the defender, the trustee's agent, wrote to the pursuer a letter, stating,—"I have been instructed by the trustee, who has already written you twice on the subject, to apply to you for evidence of your right to remove from W.'s premises a cutting machine, which you removed without his permission. Unless I have this evidence, or delivery of the machine, by Tuesday morning, I shall place the matter in the hands of the fiscal without further notice"; that the statements in the letter were false and calumnious, and falsely and calumniously implied, and were intended by the defender to imply and represent, that shortly before the date of the letter the pursuer was guilty of the crime of theft by having stolen a cutting machine from the premises of W.; that the said letter was written and sent, and the said charge of theft made by the defender against the pursuer, maliciously, without instructions from his client, the trustee, and although he well knew there were no grounds for it, for the purpose of concussing the pursuer into an abandonment of his right to the machine, and in order to gratify the feeling of ill-will. Held (1) that the letter would bear the innuendo, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue; and (2) that the word "maliciously" should not be put in the issue. Wilson v. Purvis, Nov. 1, 1890, p. 72.

REPARATION—Continued.

Slander—Innuendo—Ironical meaning attachable to words.

19. A person who conceived that his reputation had been unfairly attacked through questions put by a Member of Parliament in the House of Commons, wrote to him, and sent to a newspaper a letter in which he denied the charges alleged against himself. He went on to put the case that he should induce one of the political opponents of the member addressed to put questions in the House of Commons implying that that member had had delirium tremens, and had been intoxicated in public. Such a course, the writer stated, would be as justifiable as the conduct of the Member of Parliament had been to him. In his letter he also spoke of his illustrations of delirium tremens and drunkenness as "imaginary stories," adding "it is doubtless painful for you to hear of these stories as it is painful for me to imagine them true for the sake of bringing home to your mind the impropriety of your unfair questions." In an action of damages at the instance of the Member of Parliament against the proprietor of the newspaper in which the letter was published, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the letter represented him as a drunkard; that meaning being capable of being put upon the letter, and it being for a jury to say whether there was or was not a libel. Ritchie & Co. v. Sexton, March 19, 1891, H. L., p. 20.

Wrongous use of diligence.

20. In an action of damages for wrongous use of diligence, the pursuer averred that in the course of an action of maills and duties raised against him by an investment company,—a heritable creditor,—for whom the defenders acted as law-agents, proposals had been made that the pursuer should grant trust-conveyances for behoof of his creditors of certain heritable subjects belonging to him, and that the defenders should in return deliver to the pursuer discharges by the investment company and by themselves of certain securities; that the defenders wrote to the pursuer, "upon exchange of these documents all personal claims against you at the instance of the investment company or ourselves shall be held as discharged"; that, in terms of this arrangement, the trust-deeds were delivered and became operative; that notwithstanding the arrangements the defenders, after taking decree in the action of maills and duties against the pursuer for £28, 10s. 7d. of expenses, had wrongfully executed a charge upon the decree. The defenders maintained that the action was not relevant, in respect that it appeared from the pursuer's statement that he had after due notice allowed decree to go out against him in the action of maills and duties. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the defenders, having obtained a decree against the pursuer for £28, 10s. 7d., wrongfully and in breach of an agreement, the terms of which are contained in the letter, charged the pursuer to make payment of said sum. Sturrock v. Welsh & Forbes, Nov. 14, 1890, p. 109.

RATION—Continued.
'ongous use of diligence—Law-Agent—Malice—Issues.
In an action of maills and duties by heritable creditors against the proprietor ınd tenants of the subjects in which there was a conclusion for expenses ›nly in the event of the defenders appearing and offering opposition thereto, ıppearance was entered for A, the proprietor, who wished to be kept in-'ormed of the proceedings. A took no further step. Decree was afterwards aken by the pursuers' agent against A for expenses without intimation being nade to him. A charge was given upon the extract decree, and a petition 'or cessio threatened. A having taken objection to the proceedings as rregular, the chargers agreed to a suspension of the charge. A then brought ın action of damages against the chargers and their agent for wrongous use ›f diligence, but subsequently asked an issue against the agent only. Held 1) that the alleged use of diligence was wrongous, and (2) that the agent vas liable in damages therefor, and that it was not necessary to prove malice ınd want of probable cause. MacRobbie v. M'Lellan's Trustees, Jan. 31, 1891, p. 470.
'ongous use of diligence—Issues.
'orm of issue adjusted for the trial of a case of wrongous use of diligence ıgainst an agent of the person in whose interest it was used. MacRobbie v. M'Lellan's Trustees, Jan. 31, 1891, p. 470.
'ongous apprehension—Burgh—Police Commissioners—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 84-86.
ın an action of damages for wrongous apprehension against two police-con-ıtables and the Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow as Police Com-nissioners, the Magistrates and Town-Council were assoilzied on the ground hat the constables were not their servants, the control and management of he police being vested in another statutory body—a committee of the Police Commissioners—and the Sheriff. Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow, May 16, 1891, p. 825.
'ongous apprehension—Public officer—Malice.
ın action of damages for wrongous apprehension on a charge of importuning ınder the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, was brought against two constables,—he pursuer alleging that the defenders had at first declined to state any ground for her arrest or to allow her to acquaint her mother, who lived close ›y; that the apprehension had been made with unnecessary violence; that he had been roughly treated and hustled in presence of a large crowd on he way to the police-station; that the charge preferred against her was ıtterly groundless; and that the defenders had acted maliciously and with-›ut probable cause. Held that malice and want of probable cause must be ›ut in issue, and that the averments were sufficient to infer malice. Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow, May 16, 1891, p. 825.
'atium—Executor—Competency of new action where pursuer died from his injuries after action brought.
A workman who had received injuries while working in his master's employment raised an action against him for damages. The record was closed, and issues were adjusted. Thereafter he died intestate and ınmarried, and his mother was appointed his executrix, and was sisted in he action in his room. Thereafter she raised against the employer an ıction for damages and solatium for his death, which she alleged to be due o the accident, and craved to have that action remitted to the same jury who were to try the first action. Held that the second action was incom-›etent. Darling v. Gray & Sons, July 14, 1891, p. 1164.
'atium and damages—Death of illegitimate child.
Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the rule of law which gives to certain relatives of a person killed by the fault of another a right to solatium ınd damages does not extend to the case of the mother of an illegitimate son. Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co., July 27, 1891, H. L., p. 63.
Discharge, 3—Railway, 5—Ship, 10, 11.

RES JUDICATA. Decree dismissing action as incompetent.

The proprietor of a farm presented a petition in the Sheriff Court for interdict against the crofters on adjoining lands pasturing their cattle on pasture land upon his farm. The Sheriff found that the crofters had been in possession of the pasturage qua crofters at the date of the passing of the Crofters Act, and that, therefore, the action was incompetent. In a subsequent action raised by the pursuer in the Court of Session, concluding for declarator that the crofters had no right to pasture their cattle, &c., on his farm and for interdict against the defenders entering upon certain pasture lands which he alleged to be part of his farm, but which the defenders alleged to be part of their crofts as pasturage, the Court repelled a plea of res judicata.

Question, whether any decree in the Sheriff Court can support a plea of res judicata in the Supreme Court. Duke of Sutherland v. Reed, Dec. 18, 1890, p. 252.

See Teinds, 4.

RETENTION. Bank—Deposit.

A bank has a right to retain all negotiable instruments belonging to a customer and in its possession, for the purpose of securing a debtor balance on general account, but this right may be excluded by agreement, express or implied. Robertson's Trustee v. Royal Bank of Scotland, Oct. 24, 1890, p. 12.

REVENUE. Income-Tax—Application for certificate of over-assessment—Appeal—Competency—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 133—Taxes Management Act, 1880, secs. 57 and 58.

1. A banking company on 12th October 1888 discovered that they had been over-assessed, on their own return, for the year 1888-9, but they made no claim under the above section until 10th July 1890. The General Commissioners granted a certificate of over-assessment, holding, inter alia, that the claim for overpayment had been made "within a reasonable time." The Surveyor of Taxes appealed to the Court of Exchequer. The bank objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that an application for a certificate of over-assessment was not an appeal to the Commissioners within the meaning of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, and therefore, that an appeal from the determination of the Commissioners to the Court of Exchequer was incompetent; and, on the farther ground, that the appeal was an appeal against the determination of the Commissioners on a question of fact, viz., the reasonableness of the delay in applying for a certificate of over-assessment. The Court sustained the appeal, reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and remitted to them to refuse the certificate, holding that the bank, by failing to make the application within or at the end of the year of assessment, had lost their remedy under the Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 133. Russell v. North of Scotland Bank, Limited, Feb. 20, 1891, p. 543.

Income-tax—Abatement—Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D, Case II., Rule I.—Income-Tax Act, 1853, sec. 51—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, sec. 8.

2. The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, sec. 8, provides for an abatement of income-tax in the case of any person whose "total income from all sources" is less than £400. A bank-agent, who had an income of £374 and occupied rent free a house forming part of the bank premises, which was of the annual value of £50, was disallowed the abatement by the Assessor of Income-Tax, on the ground that the value of the house fell to be reckoned as part of his income, and that his income was not under £400. The bank-agent objected, on the ground that it was part of his duty as bank-agent to occupy the house, and that he could not sublet the house or vacate it even temporarily without consent of the directors and without another bank official being appointed to occupy it in his absence, and that he was liable to be removed at any time. The house was suitable for the bank-agent, and if it had not been provided he would have required another of the same annual value. Held that the annual value of the house occupied by the bank-agent fell to be reckoned as part of his income. Tennant v. Inland Revenue, Jan. 21, 1891, p. 428.

REVENUE—Continued.
See Justiciary Cases, 5.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. Lease—Bankruptcy—Security retenta possessione.
1. A lease of a farm from Martinmas 1858 to Martinmas 1878 provided that in the event of the tenant's bankruptcy the lease should, in the option of the landlord, be null and void, and come to an end at the next Martinmas term. It was also provided that the rent "payable for the last crop of the lease shall be exigible by the proprietor previous to the removal of any part of said crop from the ground," the tenant having the option either of paying the rent in advance, with certain discount, or finding security for payment. After 1878 the tenant continued to possess by tacit relocation, and became bankrupt in August 1890. The landlord sought to interdict the tenant and his trustee, in virtue of the clause of the lease quoted, from selling or removing any part of the crop. Held that that clause could not be made effectual as against creditors, in respect it was an attempt to create a security in the landlord's favour over moveables, the possession of which remained with the tenant, and interdict refused. M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee, Feb. 27, 1891, p. 576.

Constructive delivery—Bonded warehouse.
2. A spirit-merchant, the tenant of a general bonded warehouse, which could not be opened except by using two keys, one of which was kept by the tenant and the other by an officer of excise, obtained advances on the security of certain casks of wines and spirits belonging to him in the warehouse, for which he granted to the lender delivery-orders addressed to the excise officer, who made entries of the transfer in his books. In a question between the trustee on the tenant's sequestrated estate and the lender, held that there had been no constructive delivery of the goods to the lender, and that the security was not effectual. Rhind's Trustee v. Robertson & Baxter, March 4, 1891, p. 623.

Transmission of personal obligation against singular successor—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 47.
3. A disposition of heritage, which was burdened under a bond and disposition in security, contained a clause exempting the bond from the warrandice, and also this clause,—Which sum of £800 it has been agreed is to remain on the security of the said subjects and others as aforesaid, and the said disponee is to take upon himself the obligation to repay the same; and it is further agreed that the disponee, by acceptance hereof, declares and agrees that the personal obligation to pay principal and interest and penalty contained in said bond and disposition in security shall be a burden upon his title in the same manner as it was on that of the disponer, without the necessity of a bond of corroboration or other deed or procedure, and the personal obligation may be enforced against the disponee by summary diligence and otherwise, in the same manner as against the disponer. The disposition was recorded on behalf of the disponee. Held (1) that this was an agreement in the sense of the 47th section of the above statute; and (2) that it was not necessary to its validity that the creditor in the bond should be a party to it. Wright's Trustees v. M'Laren, May 23, 1891, p. 841.
See Discharge, 1.

RIVER. Navigation trustees—Powers and duties—Undertaking.
The undertaking of the Clyde Navigation Trustees was defined by the Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858, to embrace, inter alia, "The construction and completion of the several wet docks or tidal basins, quays, wharfs, ferry-slips, approaches, embankments or river dykes, and all other works and improvements shewn and described on the several plans and sections referred to in the recited Acts, and thereby authorised to be made and maintained." Under one of the recited Acts, the Act of 1840, the Trustees of the Clyde Navigation (sec. 11) were "empowered to make and maintain" a variety of works, including the quays of Erskine Ferry on the Clyde, which were authorised to be reconstructed. By section 50 of the Act of 1840 it was enacted that "the said quays shall, at expense of the said trustees, be repaired, so that the working of the said ferry and quay shall be made as convenient, and the working thereof as easy as before" the operations of the trustees. In an action by the proprietor of the quays at Erskine Ferry for declarator that the trustees were bound to maintain the quays, the defenders contended that their obligation under sec. 50 of the Act of 1840 was fulfilled once for all as soon as they had repaired the quays, and that sec. 11 imposed no obligation on them, but merely conferred a power. Held that the construction and maintenance of the quays constituted together an accommodation work intended to compensate the owner for interference with his property, and that the pursuer was entitled to decree. Lord Blantyre v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, Dec. 6, 1890, p. 197.

RIVER—Continued.

ROAD. Road trustees—Powers—Level-crossing—Removal.

Held that when road trustees have sanctioned the formation of a railway level-crossing over one of their roads they are not entitled arbitrarily to demand its removal or to impose unreasonable conditions upon its continuance. Middle Ward of Lanarkshire Trustees v. Lord Belhaven's Trustee, June 16, 1891, p. 949.

See Servitude.

SALE. Auction—Printed conditions of sale—Sale by sample or by bulk.

1. The purchaser of certain cases of apples, at a sale of apples by auction, having rejected the apples as being disconform to sample, the auctioneer brought an action against him for the price, denying that the sale was by sample, and founding on the following condition, which he averred was one of the conditions of the sale:—"3. Goods to be delivered to the purchaser as they now lie, with all faults and defects, without any allowance for inaccurate description of marks, quality, quantity, and condition, and intending buyers are requested to thoroughly inspect the bulk." From a proof it appeared that printed conditions of sale, including that above quoted, were hung up in front of the auctioneer's rostrum, but the auctioneer neither read the conditions out to those attending the sale nor directed their attention to them. The defender deponed that he had not read the conditions, though in his evidence he did not dispute that he knew of them. The apples in bulk were stored in cases in a cellar underneath the auction-room, and the auctioneer's cellarman took six of these cases at random, and having opened them, placed them on a dais in the auction-room in sight of those attending the sale. The auctioneer referred to these six open cases as containing specimens of the apples for sale. The defender discovered on delivery that most of the apples he had bought were much decayed. Held that the sale was not a sale by sample, that the condition above quoted applied, and imposed on the defender the duty of satisfying himself as to the condition of the apples in bulk, and therefore that decree fell to be granted as concluded for. W. N. White & Co., Limited, v. Dougherty, June 19, 1891, p. 972.

See Bankruptcy, 14.

Author and publisher—Bankruptcy.

2. Held that the contract between an author and a publisher, by which the publisher takes the risk, and the profits are halved, is a contract of sale of the right to publish the edition of the book to which the contract refers. Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee, Jan. 29, 1891, p. 460.

An author and a publisher entered into an agreement "regarding the publication" of an edition of a book. The publisher agreed to relieve the author of the expenses of publication. The author agreed to furnish the drawings for the woodcuts. The expenses were to form a first charge against the book, the proceeds of sales to be divided equally, after these charges had been paid. Copies sold were to be accounted for "at the usual trade sale price." The publisher became bankrupt, and his trustee offered (1) to find another publisher to take the place of the bankrupt, or (2) to hand over the whole stock of books to the author at a valuation, or (3) to buy the author's interest at a valuation. All these offers were rejected, and the trustee sold the stock of books, after an interval of two months and a-half, to a bookseller considerably below the trade price. He tendered the whole of the price so received to the author. The author raised an action against the trustee for accounting and declarator that the defender must account to him for the books at the usual trade sale price. Action dismissed,—Lords Young, Rutherfurd Clark, and Trayner holding that the agreement constituted a sale of the right to publish the edition of the book in question, and that therefore the property in the books belonged to the trustee; the Lord Justice-Clerk holding that in the circumstances the pursuer was not entitled to require the trustee to do more than he had offered to do. Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee, Jan. 29, 1891, p. 460.

.E—Continued.

'e of heritage—Posting of conveyance.
n a petitory action in the Court of Session against a domiciled American, /hom the pursuers averred to be the proprietor of heritage in Scotland, 'e defender pleaded no jurisdiction, averring that although he had been ; one time the proprietor of such heritage he had sold it before the raising ' the action. It appeared that in October 1889 the defender became pro- ietor of certain heritable subjects in Scotland; that by improbative mis- 'es, dated November and December 1890, he sold these subjects; that 9th January 1891 he executed and on 12th January dispatched by post m America a conveyance of the subjects in favour of the purchaser; and t this conveyance did not reach the purchaser till after the service of the ımons, which took place on 21st January. Held that as the transfer- ; of the subjects had not been completed until after the service of the mons the plea of no jurisdiction fell to be repelled. Dowie & Co. v. ıant, Jan. 23, 1891, p. 986.

'heritage—Agreement to accept title subject to all exceptions.
greement for the sale of heritage contained a stipulation that the pur- r should accept the title to the subjects "as it at present stands, and ct to all exceptions of any nature." Held that the purchaser was not l by that stipulation to accept a title which was not marketable and could not be made marketable by any expenditure on his part. v. Lornie, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 353.

eritage—Title—Montgomery Act, sec. 5—Stipulation to build dwel- uses.
ıntgomery Act, which gave power to heirs of entail to grant building or ninety-nine years, provided by sec. 5,—"That every such lease ntain a condition that the lease shall be void, and the same is hereby l void, if one dwelling-house at least not under the value of £10 shall not be built within the space of ten years from the date of the or each half acre of ground let. The tenant in a ninety-nine years' ler the Act, which contained a stipulation that the tenant should lwelling-house of the value of £50 within three years, and that s doing so the lease should be void, erected a factory, but no dwel- e, within the three years, and thereafter entered into an agreement le of the subjects, the purchaser becoming bound to accept the it at present stands, and subject to all exceptions of any nature." , whether the building of the factory was or was not sufficient of the obligation to build in a question with the heir of entail, as not a title which the purchaser was bound to accept. Carter Dec. 20, 1890, p. 353.

ge—Title—Rutherfurd Act, sec. 24—Consideration other than of the Rutherfurd Act provides that it shall not be lawful for any heir of entail in granting a feu or long lease to take any grassum, or fine, or valuable consideration other than the rent for granting such feu or lease, otherwise such feu or lease shall be void. In a lease for eighty-one and a-half years, granted by an heir of entail, the consideration was an annual payment of £36, 16s. payable, to the extent of £26, 16s., by the tenant and, to the extent of £10, by an insurance company under a bond of annuity in favour of the heir of entail and his successors in the entail. The tenant entered into an agreement for the sale of the subjects, the purchaser becoming bound to accept the title "as it at present stands, and subject to all exceptions of any nature." Held that the obligation by the insurance company to pay an annuity was not equivalent to rent, and that the lease was not a title which the purchaser was bound to accept. Carter v. Lornie, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 353.

SALE—Continued.

Sale of heritage—Title—Tender of valid title pending action for implement.

7. An action was brought by the seller of heritage against the purchaser to have him ordained to implement his part of the contract by accepting a disposition of the subjects and paying the price. After the opinion of the Court had been delivered, to the effect that the title offered by the seller was not such as the purchaser was bound to accept, the seller tendered a minute in which he offered the purchaser a title to which no exception could be taken. The purchaser had obtained possession of the subjects at the date mentioned in the agreement of sale, and had removed the machinery in a factory which formed part of the subjects. The defender pleaded that tender of a good title was now too late, and that he was not bound to accept it. Held that the purchaser was bound to accept the title offered. Carter v. Lornie, Dec. 20, 1890, p. 353.

See Heritable and Moveable, 5.

SCHOOL. Dismissal of teacher—Ultra vires—Committee of Council on Education—Public Teachers Act, 1882, sec. 3, subsec. 2.

1. In 1888 the Committee of Council on Education in Scotland resolved to give assistance to certain school boards in Scotland on condition, inter alia, that the board accepting the assistance should commit the management of their school to three managers, of whom one should be Her Majesty's inspector of schools for the district, which managers should have full power to dismiss the teacher. The School Board of B. adopted this arrangement, and appointed M. and H., two of their number, to be managers along with the inspector of schools for the district. In 1890 the School Board of B., by a majority of the whole members, passed a resolution dismissing the school teacher on three months' notice, the minute of the board bearing that "Mr R., Her Majesty's inspector, and Mr M., in their capacity as managers, concurred in and agreed to the dismissal. Mr H., in his capacity as manager, opposed the same." The teacher having refused to remove from the schoolmaster's house (which formed part of his emoluments) on the ground that his dismissal was illegal, in respect that if the power of dismissal had been validly delegated to the managers, they had not competently exercised it, and that if the power of dismissal remained in the school board it had been invalidly exercised by the inspector taking part in the proceedings, the board brought an action for ejectment. Held that the dismissal was valid.

Opinion that the regulation of the Committee of Council making it a condition of giving assistance to school boards that the power of dismissing the teacher should be in the hands of the managers was ultra vires, as being inconsistent with the Public School Teachers Act, 1882, sec. 3, subsec. 2. School Board of Barvas v. Macgregor, March 10, 1891, p. 647.

Scheme by the Educational Endowment Commissioners—Alteration of scheme—Educational Endowments Act, 1882, sec. 20.

2. Petition for the amendment of a scheme under the above Act refused, on the ground that it was truly an application for power to make payments to certain persons, and not for an alteration of the scheme of the nature contemplated by the Act. Governors of Dollar Institution, Nov. 28, 1890, p. 174.

OL—Continued.
Scheme amended by the addition of a clause empowering the governors, having regard to the circumstances of any particular case, and with consent of the Scotch Education Department, to make reasonable compensation to teachers or other officers in schools discontinued under the scheme. Governors of Logan and Johnston School, Dec. 5, 1890, p. 190.
hool Bursary—Qualification of candidate—Discretion of School Governors —Educational Endowments Commissioners—Scheme.
By a scheme framed by the Commissioners appointed under the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, it was, inter alia, provided that a bursary should be awarded by competitive examination "among those who have been pupils in public or state-aided schools in the parish of B. for at least six months before the date of examination, and whose parents or guardians require aid for giving them higher education. It shall be tenable for such period, not exceeding four years, as the Governors may determine, at a university or school for higher or technical, or professional education, to be approved by the Governors." After an examination, held on 25th April 1889, the Governors awarded the bursary to W., and declared that M. was second in the examination. Circumstances in which held that M.'s absence from the school was not such as to disqualify him from competing for the bursary, but that W. having left the school was no longer entitled to compete, and therefore that M. was entitled to the bursary.
Observed that the Court would have been slow to interfere with the award of the Governors on the ground that the successful pupil's father did not require aid in giving his son higher education. M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 521.
ıe Sheriff, 6.

ITUDE. Road—Constitution—Occasional use as access to shooting ground. mountain path through a projecting tongue of an adjoining property formed a convenient short cut from one part of an estate to another, and from 1821 it was used by the proprietors of the estate as the means of going from the one part of the estate to the other when deerstalking in autumn, but it was used by them for no other purpose and at no other time, and between 1846 and 1878 they hardly used it at all. It was not proved that this use of the path had come to the knowledge of the proprietor of the adjoining estate except on two occasions, in 1857 and 1882, and on both occasions it was challenged by him. In 1888 he brought a note of suspension and interdict against the future use of the path by the respondent. Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the use of the path proved was not sufficient to shew that it was in the assertion of a right, and therefore that the respondent had failed to instruct the existence of a servitude right of way over the path in question. M'Inroy v. Duke of Athole, July 2, 1891, H. L., p. 46.

RIFF. Jurisdiction—Citation—Registered letter—Debts Recovery Act, 1867 —Citation Amendment Act, 1882, sec. 3.
The proprietor of a fishing station brought an action under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, in the Sheriff Court of the county in which the station was situated, against his tenant, for arrears of rent. At the date of the summons the defender was in possession of the fishing station, and had thereon fish-curing stock and plant, but had ceased to carry on active operations. He was resident in another sheriffdom, and was cited by means of a registered letter sent by the agent of the pursuer. The defender pleaded (1) no jurisdiction, in respect that he had no domicile, and was not carrying on business in the county; and (2) that he had not been properly cited. Held (1) that the Sheriff had jurisdiction, and (2) that the citation was valid. Mouat v. Lee, June 6, 1891, p. 876. urisdiction—Proof of irregular marriage incidental to civil action.
In an ordinary civil action it is competent for a Sheriff to decide incidentally, for the purposes of the action, whether two persons, not parties to the action, have been irregularly married. M'Donald v. Mackenzie, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 502.

SHERIFF—Continued.

Jurisdiction—Process—Union of several counties into one sheriffdom—Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 4—Sheriffs Act, 1870, secs. 4, 5, 6, 12.

3. In a sheriffdom in which several counties are combined the granting of a warrant to cite a defender to appear at a Court in a county which is not the county of his domicile, is a matter within the discretion of the Sheriff. Tait v. Johnston, Feb. 28, 1891, p. 606.

4. The Sheriff-substitute of a county divided into two districts by an order of a Secretary of State following on the Statute 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86, refused a warrant to cite to the Court at the head burgh of the county a defender belonging to another district of the county. Held that an appeal against this refusal was incompetent. Davidson v. Davidson, June 9, 1891, p. 884.

Proof—Loss of shorthand writer's notes—Nobile officium.

5. When the shorthand writer's notes of the testimony of certain witnesses in a proof taken in a Sheriff Court action had been accidentally destroyed, the Court, on the petition of the pursuer, which was opposed by the defender, remitted to the Sheriff to take the evidence of these witnesses of new, but expressed the opinion that the Sheriff might have allowed the evidence to be taken of new without such authority. Yates v. Robertson, July 18, 1891, p. 1206.

Appeal—Local Government Act, 1889, secs. 86, 105.

6. The Local Government Act, 1889 (sec. 86), enacts that if under the provisions thereof a teacher appointed previously to the passing of the Education Act, 1872, shall be prejudiced in his right to school fees, he shall be entitled to compensation from the school board, "and such compensation, failing agreement, may be determined finally by the Sheriff." In an action brought in the Sheriff Court by a teacher against a school board praying for declarator that the pursuer was entitled to a certain sum annually as compensation for fees under the above Act, the Sheriff-substitute appointed the pursuer to lodge a minute giving details as to fees previously received by him. The pursuer having appealed, the Sheriff allowed the pursuer a proof. The defenders appealed to the Court of Session. Held that the appeal was incompetent. M'Gilp v. Kilchoman School Board, March 17, 1891, p. 714.

Small-Debt cases—See Jurisdiction, 7—Justiciary Cases, 1 to 4.

SHIP. Affreightment—Bill of lading—Exemption of liability of shipowner for default of crew in the "navigation" of the ship.

1. Goods were shipped under a bill of lading which exempted the shipowner from liability for "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilot, master, or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage." The goods were damaged in consequence of the absence of casing on the pipe of a water-closet, which was broken by the pressure of the cargo in rough weather. It was proved that the master and crew had, shortly before the ship sailed with the cargo in question, removed the casing, and had thought it unnecessary to replace it before sailing, as they relied on other means for protecting the pipe from injury. In an action at the instance of an onerous indorsee of the bill of lading against the owners, held that the pipe ought to have been provided with casing, that the failure to provide it was a default of the master or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage, and therefore that the shipowner was not liable. Gilroy v. Price & Co., Dec. 27, 1891, p. 569.

Carriage of goods—Delivery.

2. In discharging a cargo of salt, loaded in bulk, part of the cargo was lost through defects in the gearing of the vessel, by reason of which some of the contents of the buckets in which the salt was swung ashore was jerked out, and fell between the ship and quay. The charter-party bore that the cargo was to be "brought to and taken from alongside." Held that this obligation had not been implemented, and that the ship was liable for the loss. Avon Steamship Co., Limited, v. Leask & Co., Dec. 18, 1890, p. 280.

SHIP—Continued.

Demurrage—Charter-party—Delivery retarded by fault of railway company.

3. A ship with a cargo of pit props, at the port of delivery, was berthed at a quay where, by the rules of the harbour, such a cargo could not be deposited. Delay in taking delivery took place in consequence of a railway company failing to provide a sufficient supply of trucks. Held that it was no answer to a claim for demurrage that the delay was caused by the fault of the railway company. Kruuse v. Drynan & Co., July 9, 1891, p. 1110.

4. The time occupied in loading a vessel is not, in the absence of stipulation, to be lumped with the time occupied in discharging her to the effect of working off by extra despatch in the one operation demurrage incurred by delay in the other. Avon Steamship Co., Limited, v. Leask & Co., Dec. 18, 1890, p. 280.

Charter—Freight—Hire to cease when ship inefficient.

5. In a charter-party the charterer became bound to pay hire for a steam-vessel at a certain rate per month, and the owners to provide the officers and crew and stores. It was stipulated that "in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." On 30th September 1887, on a voyage from the West Coast of Africa to Harburg, the high-pressure engine broke down, and the vessel put in to Las Palmas in the Canary Isles, where she was pronounced to be unfit to proceed on her voyage. As repairs could not be effected in that port, the owners and charterers arranged to send from England a tug to bring the ship to Harburg, it being agreed that the cost should be treated as general average. The ship arrived at the port of discharge by the use of her low-pressure engine and with the assistance of the tug. The charterer paid £867 as his share of the cost of the tug. In an action by the shipowner against the charterer for £341, 4s. 8d., as the hire of the ship from the time she left Las Palmas with the assistance of the tug till she was discharged, held (1) (diss. Lord Bramwell, aff. judgment of Second Division) that the ship had not been "in an efficient state" for completing her voyage from the time of the accident, and that in terms of the charter-party the owner had no claim to hire for the subsequent voyage, but (2) (diss. Lord Morris, varying judgment of Second Division) that the charterers must pay hire for the full period during which she was engaged in discharging her cargo at the port of arrival, the ship being then in an efficient state for performing that part of the contract. Hogarth v. Miller, Brother, & Co., Dec. 1, 1890, H. L., p. 10.

Master—Cargo—Excepted perils—Duty of master in regard to goods damaged by excepted perils.

6. There is a duty on the master of a ship, as representing the shipowner, to take reasonable care of the goods entrusted to him, and, in the event of loss or deterioration resulting from accidents covered by the exceptions in the charter-party, to take reasonable measures in order that the loss or deterioration may be minimised. Adam v. J. & D. Morris, Nov. 26, 1890, p. 153.

Salvage—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 460—Jurisdiction.

7. Held that the words "at or near the place where such ship or boat is lying," in the above enactment, mean at or near the place where the ship is brought immediately after the accident, and do not include any place where the ship may afterwards be when a dispute arises.

Opinions that an insurance company, with which a salved vessel is insured, cannot be convened in such proceedings. Summers v. Buchan, June 6, 1891, p. 879.

Liability of owners inter se—Contribution.

8. All the owners of a ship except A, who had one share, were resident in

SHIP—Continued.

England, and in an action in the English Courts, in which A was not called, were found liable to owners of cargo in damages caused by its loss. A, who resided in Scotland, was informed of the action, but did not interfere. In an action in the Scottish Courts against A at the instance of the other owners of the ship to have him found liable to contribute his share of the ship's liabilities, held that the costs of the English action, at the instance of the cargo owners, fell to be included among these liabilities, and that the defender was liable for his share. Bennett v. Maclellan, June 16, 1891, p. 955.

Shipping casualty appeal—The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 242—"Wrongful act or default"—Expenses.

9. Appeal by the master of a ship against a judgment suspending his certificate refused, on the ground that his failure, through unreasonable panic, to take measures open to him with a view to saving the ship amounted to a "default" on his part, but no expenses found due, as the bulk of the evidence led and printed related to a portion of the case which was departed from by the Board of Trade when the case came before the Court of Session. Brown v. Board of Trade, Dec. 18, 1890, p. 291.

Reparation — Harbour — Contributory negligence of master of vessel — Expenses.

10. A sailing vessel, on entering a harbour, got aground and suffered damage, for which the owner sued the harbour trustees. At the time of the accident the vessel was within the limits of the jurisdiction of the harbourmaster, but there were two local pilots on board, and it was proved that the accident was due to the fact that a wrong course was steered. Both the harbourmaster, who gave directions from the shore, in answer to inquiries from the vessel, and those on board the vessel were ignorant that the tide had begun to ebb, thus making the navigation more difficult. In an action of damages at the instance of the owner of the vessel against the harbour trustees, held that although the harbourmaster was in fault in the directions which he gave, there was contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the navigation of the vessel, and defenders assoilzied.

The defenders were found entitled to expenses. Renney v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, Dec. 19, 1890, p. 294.

Collision—Pilot—Compulsory pilotage district—Master—Responsibility for leaving dock—Employment of tug—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 388.

11. The "Strathspey," a steamship of 992 tons, shortly after leaving the port of Glasgow, and when in charge of a pilot, and within the compulsory pilotage district of the River Clyde, in going down the river, came into collision with, and injured another vessel, the "Islay." The accident was due to the violence of the wind and the "Strathspey's" want of steerageway, arising from an unusually strong ebb tide, and the slow rate at which the vessel was moving in order to comply with the river bye-laws, which forbade more than a certain rate of speed. In an action of damages at the instance of the owner of the "Islay" against the owners of the "Strathspey" the pursuer pleaded that the master of the "Strathspey" was answerable either by himself or in conjunction with the pilot for allowing his ship to leave the dock, and for neglecting to employ a stern tug to assist in steering her, and that the weather and tide conditions were such as to amount to a case of manifest danger, for the disregard of which the presence of the pilot did not relieve him from liability. Held that as the pilot was in charge before the vessel left the dock, it was for him to decide whether she could prudently leave her moorings, and whether a tug was required, and that the pursuer, on whom the onus lay, had failed to prove contributory negligence on the part of the master; and further, that the local conditions of wind and tide on the day in question did not present a case of manifest danger such as to have made it the duty of the master to have taken his ship out of the hands of the pilot. Owners of the "Strathspey" v. Owner of the "Islay," et e contra, July 3, 1891, p. 1048.

—Continued.
ersuading seaman to desert—Person verbally engaged as storekeeper who had not signed articles—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, secs. 2 and 257.
A, a storekeeper on a homeward bound vessel, was on her arrival formally discharged, but verbally re-engaged to act in that capacity for the vessel's next voyage, and also to remain by her and to attend to the stores while she lay in harbour. Before he had signed articles for the voyage, an attempt was made to induce him to leave the vessel by a delegate of a Seamen's Union. The delegate on being convicted of an offence under section 257 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, appealed to the High Court of Justiciary on the ground that A was not a "seaman" within the meaning of section 2 of the Act, because he had not signed articles. Held that A was a seaman in the sense of the Act, and appeal dismissed. Thomson v. Hart, Oct. 27, 1890, Just. Cases, p. 3.
ee Insurance.

NDER. See Reparation, 12 to 19.

LL-DEBT COURT. See Jurisdiction, 7—Justiciary Cases, 1 to 4.

MP. Receipt—Discharge.
1 defence to an action by a widow for certain half-yearly payments of an annuity, to which she was entitled under the will of her husband, his trustees alleged that the pursuer had agreed to hold her maintenance by the liferenter of her deceased husband's estate as equivalent to her annuity for the time, and produced a document titled an "acknowledgment" by her, which set forth certain half-yearly moieties of her annuity, including those sued for, and which concluded,—"I acknowledge that my annuity as above detailed has been duly accounted for to me by the trustees of the late" husband. It was signed by her, but bore no stamp. Held that the document was of the nature of a receipt, and being unstamped could not be looked at as evidence of the alleged agreement. Cameron v. Panton's Trustees, March 19, 1891, p. 728.

TUTE. Casus improvisus.
pecial case for the opinion of the Court regarding the liabilities of two parishes in respect to the parochial relief of persons who were resident on a portion of one parish which had under the Local Government Act, 1889, been transferred to the other, dismissed, in respect that it presented no question of law. Parochial Board of Borthwick v. Parochial Board of Temple, July 17, 1891, p. 1190.

TUTES.
579, cap. 83. See Prescription, 1, 2.
592, cap. 141. See Process, 1.
696, cap. 5. See Bankruptcy, 5, 6, 7.
4 Geo. II. cap. 40 (Tippling Act). See Public-House, 1.
0 Geo. III. cap. 51 (Montgomery Act). See Sale, 5.
9 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 98 (Thellusson Act). See Succession, 1, 2.
Geo. IV. cap. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825). See Process, 8, 17, 21. and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53. See Administration of Justice, 2—Justiciary Cases, 5.
Geo. IV. cap. 58 (Home Drummond Act). See Public-House, 2, 3. and 3 Will. IV. cap. 65 (Reform Act, 1832). See Election Law, 3.
Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 41 (Small-Debt Act, 1837). See Jurisdiction, 7—Justiciary Cases, 1 to 4. and 2 Vict. cap. 119 (Sheriff Courts Act, 1838). See Election Law, 3.
and 6 Vict. cap. 35 (Income-Tax Act, 1842). See Revenue, 1, 2. and 8 Vict. cap. 53. See Justiciary Cases, 5.
0 Vict. cap. 27 (Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847). See Justiciary Cases, 17.

STATUTES—Continued.
11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36 (Entail Amendment Act, 1848). See Entail, 1—Sale, 6.
12 and 13 Vict. cap. 51 (Pupils Protection Act, 1849). See Process, 15.
13 and 14 Vict. cap. 92 (Cruelty to Animals Act, 1850). See Justiciary Cases, 11, 23.
16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34 (Income-Tax Act, 1853). See Revenue, 2.
16 and 17 Vict. cap. 92 (Sheriff Court Act, 1853). See Sheriff, 3, 4.
17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104 (Merchant Shipping Act, 1854). See Justiciary Cases, 15—Ship, 7, 9, 11.
19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79 (Bankruptcy Act, 1856). See Bankruptcy.
20 and 21 Vict. cap. 56 (Distribution of Business Act, 1857). See Process, 15.
25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35 (Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862). See Public-House, 2.
25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89 (Companies Act, 1862). See Company.
25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101 (General Police and Improvement Act, 1862). See Justiciary Cases, 21—Police, 1, 2.
25 and 26 Vict. cap. 114 (Poaching Prevention Act, 1862). See Justiciary Cases, 12, 13.
25 and 26 Vict. cap. cciii. (Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862). See Justiciary Cases, 16.
27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53 (Summary Procedure Act, 1864). See Justiciary Cases, 6, 22, 23.
29 and 30 Vict. cap. clvi. (Greenock Port and Harbour Act, 1866). See Harbour—Justiciary Cases, 17.
29 and 30 Vict. cap. ccxxiii. (Glasgow Police Act, 1866). See Burgh, 2, 3, 7, 8—Reparation, 23.
29 and 30 Vict. cap. cccl. (The Caledonian and Scottish North-Eastern Railways Amalgamation Act, 1866). See Railway, 4.
30 and 31 Vict. cap. 26 (Debts Recovery Act, 1867). See Sheriff, 1.
30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101 (Public Health Act, 1867). See Police, 1—Reparation, 11.
30 and 31 Vict. cap. 131 (Companies Act, 1867). See Company, 5.
31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48 (Representation of the People Act, 1868). See Election Law, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7.
31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868). See Process, 13, 14.
31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101 (Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868). See Heritable and Moveable, 1, 2—Succession, 19, 20—Personal or Transmissible.
33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86 (Sheriffs Act, 1870). See Sheriff, 3, 4—Process, 18.
34 and 35 Vict. cap. 81 (Act to Abolish Reductions ex capite lecti). See Succession, 11—Heritable and Moveable, 4.
37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94 (Conveyancing Act, 1874). See Writ, 1, 2—Right in Security, 3.
38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62 (Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875). See Justiciary Cases, 5.
38 and 39 Vict. cap. 86 (Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875). See Justiciary Cases, 14.
39 and 40 Vict. cap. 16 (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876). See Revenue, 2.
41 and 42 Vict. cap. 74 (Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878). See Jurisdiction, 9—Public Health.
43 and 44 Vict. cap. 19 (Taxes Management Act, 1880). See Revenue, 1.
43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34 (Debtors Act, 1880). See Bankruptcy, 1—Diligence, 2—Justiciary Cases, 10.
43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42 (Employers Liability Act, 1880). See Reparation, 4, 5, 7.
44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21 (Married Women's Property Act, 1881). See Husband and Wife, 2, 6—Succession, 24.

STATUTES—Continued.
44 and 45 Vict. cap. 22 (Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881). See Bankruptcy, 4.
45 and 46 Vict. cap. 18 (Public Teachers Act, 1882). See School, 1.
45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53 (Entail Act, 1882). See Entail, 2, 4.
45 and 46 Vict. cap. 59 (Educational Endowments Act, 1882). See School, 2, 3.
45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61 (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882). See Bill of Exchange, 3.
45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77 (Citation Amendment Act, 1882). See Process, 1—Sheriff, 1.
47 and 48 Vict. cap. 16 (Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities Act, 1884). See Justiciary Cases, 10.
48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3 (Representation of the People Act, 1884). See Election Law, 1, 2, 7, 8.
49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27 (Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886). See Judicial Factor, 1.
49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29 (Crofters Holdings Act, 1886). See Lease, 6, 7, 8, 9—Jurisdiction, 5.
50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35 (Criminal Procedure Act, 1887). See Justiciary Cases, 19.
50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58 (Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887). See Mines and Minerals, 3, 4—Justiciary Cases, 20.
52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50 (Local Government Act, 1889). See Statute—Process, 19.
52 and 53 Vict. cap. 72 (Infectious Diseases (Notification) Act, 1889). See Justiciary Cases, 22.
53 and 54 Vict. cap. 62 (Companies Memorandum of Association Act, 1890). See Company, 3.

STOCK EXCHANGE. See Bank, 3.

SUCCESSION. Accumulation—Thellusson Act.
1. Held that the Thellusson Act prohibits any accumulation after the lapse of twenty-one years from the date of a testator's death, although the time specified for accumulation may not commence till long after his death. Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, June 30, 1891, p. 992.

Rents of Heritage—Thellusson Act.
2. In a trust-settlement the testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow the rents of certain lands during her life, and at her death to accumulate the rents for the purchase of additional lands till the death of the longest liver of certain nephews and nieces, and upon that event to execute an entail in favour of the heir of the body of his nephew L. C., whom failing, &c. The deed contained a declaration that notwithstanding the death of the testator's widow the trust should continue till all the trust purposes had been carried into effect, and "declaring also that the institute or heir of entail herein pointed out for the time being who but for the continued existence of the trust hereby created would be in possession of the said lands" "shall be entitled to provide and secure his wife and younger children who shall not succeed to the said lands" "in provisions of the like amount as if such institute or heir were actually in possession of my said lands." The testator's widow survived him for thirty-two years. In an action of multiplepoinding brought by the trustees to determine the right to the rents accrued since the widow's death, held (1) that the Thellusson Act applied so as to prohibit accumulation; (2) that the failure of the trust purpose of accumulation did not accelerate the date for executing the entail, as until the death of the longest liver of the testator's nephews and nieces it was uncertain who should be the institute; (3) that in the meantime each term's rent as it accrued belonged to the person holding at that time the character of heir-at-law of the truster. Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, June 30, 1891, p. 992.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Accumulations—Uncertainty.

3. Terms of holograph settlement on the construction of which held that as a direction to accumulate therein contained was unambiguous, and as it did not appear that at the expiration of the period of accumulation the directions in the will would necessarily be incapable of execution, the direction to accumulate must receive effect in so far as permitted by the statute, and that it was premature to determine in hoc statu the rights of parties in the capital and accumulations. Edward's Trustees v. Edward, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 535.

Annuity—Preference.

4. A testator left to his wife an annuity of £400, and to his mother, "if my estate will permit," an annuity of £100. He left no other testamentary provision. Held that both annuities were payable out of capital, but that the annuity to the wife was preferable to that of the mother. Adamson's Trustees v. Adamson's Executors, July 14, 1891, p. 1133.

Clause of return.

5. A testator directed his trustees to pay to his wife (1) £2100 with full power of disposal thereof; (2) "£2000 to be held by her during her lifetime, and the uncontrolled possession and profit of which she shall enjoy as long as she lives, which sum, however, should nothing occur to render it necessary to touch upon, or induce her to dispose of it otherwise, which she shall have power to do, the same or balance thereof shall at her death return and form part of my trust-estate." In a supplementary settlement he directed his trustees to pay his wife (1) the said £2100 to be at her sole disposal; and (2) the £2000, "the free and unfettered use of which she shall enjoy so long as she lives, with power even to trench upon the principal should she ever under any emergency require to do so; declaring, however, that the said £2000 so far as not required for my wife's personal use shall at her death return, and, if thought necessary, be ordered by her then to return to my estate." The wife survived. At her death she left the £2000 separately invested from her other means, but disposed of it expressly by will. Held that the wife had no power to dispose of the £2000 mortis causa, and that it belonged to the husband's trustees. Barr's Trustees v. Barr's Trustees, Feb. 19, 1891, p. 541.

6. Held (by a majority of the whole Court) that the implied conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit does not apply to provisions by a testator in favour of his brothers and sisters. Hall v. Hall, March 17, 1891, p. 690.

Conditio si sine liberis decesserit—Inter vivos deed—Destination.

7. By inter vivos deed two sisters conveyed certain heritable subjects to themselves and another sister in liferent, and to their nieces nominatim, and the survivors or survivor of them, in fee, and infeftment followed for these respective rights. One of the nieces having thereafter died without having altered the destination, her son claimed a third of the fee, pleading the conditio. Held that he was not entitled to it—per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young, in respect (1) that the conveyance was of an isolated subject, and was not part of a general settlement; (2) that it was in favour not of a class but of certain individuals named; and (3) that there was a conditional institution of survivors; per Lord Rutherfurd Clark, on the ground that the conveyance contained a destination of the subjects, which must receive effect. Crichton's Trustee v. Howat's Tutor, Dec. 18, 1890, p. 260.

Question, whether the doctrine of the conditio si sine liberis can be applied in the case of an inter vivos deed. Crichton's Trustee v. Howat's Tutor, Dec. 18, 1890, p. 260.

Question, whether the conditio is applicable to provisions to children in marriage-contracts. Edwardes v. Hughes, Dec. 19, 1890, p. 319.

8. Where one member of a class which has been instituted to a bequest has died before the date of the settlement, the conditio will not apply in favour of the children of that member. Morrison's Trustees v. Macdonalds, Nov. 29, 1890, p. 181.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Conditional institution—Disposition by husband to wife, "her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever."

9. A husband by disposition, on the narrative that it was a duty incumbent on him to settle his affairs in case of his death, and for the love, favour, and affection he bore to E., his wife, disponed to her, "her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," certain heritable property specified, and also his whole other estate, heritable and moveable. The wife predeceased the husband without children. The husband married again, and died without issue and without having altered the settlement. In a question between the first wife's heir-at-law and the husband's heir-at-law, held that the former was entitled to the heritable property as conditional institute. Cleland v. Allan, Jan. 13, 1891, p. 377.

Deathbed—Cash payment—34 and 35 Vict. c. 81.

10. A father executed a deed of provision "to come into operation during my lifetime," whereby he conveyed to trustees for behoof of three of his children nominatim, the sum of £6000 (£3200 of which I have handed to them in cash) . . ." The deed was delivered immediately after its execution, and the £3200 was at the same time handed by the granter to the trustees by cheque payable to one of them. A child of the granter of the deed, who had not been mentioned in it, sought to have it declared that she was entitled to legitim out of the £3200 handed over in cash, averring that the sum had been handed to the trustees by her father on deathbed. Held that the pursuer's averment was irrelevant, in respect the payment of the money was to be regarded as made in implement of the deed of provision, and not as an independent transaction.

Question, whether the Act 34 and 35 Vict. c. 81, abolished the law of deathbed with respect to written instruments only, and not with respect to gifts made without writing. Hay v. Coutts' Trustees, Dec. 16, 1890, p. 244.

Deathbed—Reduction—Title to sue.

11. A woman, by antenuptial contract conveyed her whole heritable and moveable estate to trustees, to hold it for her liferent use, or in the event of her husband's survivance, for his liferent use, and lastly, for the use and behoof of the child or children who might be procreated of her body, declaring that after the death of the survivor of the spouses the "trustees shall pay over or assign the trust funds and estate to the lawful child or children of the said" wife, the wife having a power of appointment, or failing her the surviving husband. It was also to be "lawful and competent" to the wife, whom failing, to the husband, "to restrict, if he or she shall see cause, the right of any of the said children to the liferent merely of their provisions, and to secure the principal to their lawful issue, or failing such issue, to the other children" of the wife, "declaring that the share of each child shall vest and become payable on the death of" the survivor of the spouses, "and on each of the said children attaining the age of twenty-one years complete or being married." The wife died in 1868, predeceasing her husband. There was one child of the marriage, a daughter. The wife had on deathbed executed along with her husband a mutual disposition and settlement, whereby they respectively conveyed their whole estates to the survivor. In 1889 the daughter raised against her father and various disponees from him an action for reduction ex capite lecti of the mutual disposition and settlement, and of the deeds following thereon. Held that the pursuer's interest as heir was excluded by the marriage-contract, under which her right might at her father's pleasure be reduced to a liferent, and therefore that she had no title to sue. Wyllie v. M'Bride, Dec. 10, 1890, p. 218.

See Heritable and Moveable, 4—Prescription, 3—Trust, 5.

Discharge—Confusio—Right in security—Ground-annual.

12. A lady, by trust-disposition and settlement, directed her trustees to dispone certain heritable subjects to a person named, "under burden of any heritable securities that may affect the same, and the feu-duty, ground-annual, and other burdens affecting it." Prior to the date of her settlement the truster had obtained assignations to the only ground-annuals affecting the subjects. She subsequently paid up a bond affecting the subjects, and took an assignation thereto. Held (1) that the bond had been extinguished confusione, and that the disponee was entitled to the property free of the burden of this bond, but (2) (diss. Lord Young) that he must take the property under burden of the ground-annuals, that being the intention of the truster as expressed by her settlement. Murray v. Parlane's Trustee, Dec. 18, 1890, p. 287.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Election—Approbate and Reprobate.

13. A legatee, who has also a claim ex lege to part of the testator's estate included by that testator in a general settlement, cannot be called on to make his election between the legacy and his legal right, if, by his abandonment of his legal right, the estate to which that right entitles him will not be surrendered to the uses of the will, but will be treated as undisposed of. Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson, March 20, 1891, p. 793.

Executor—Appointment.

14. In a holograph settlement a testator appointed a person, naming him, "judicial factor, to carry out the purposes of this trust." Held that the person so named was entitled to be confirmed as executor-nominate. Tod, Nov. 25, 1890, p. 152.

Faculties and powers—Power to appoint under "conditions, provisions, and limitations."

15. By antenuptial marriage-contract the trustees were directed, after the death of the survivor of the spouses "to pay over" certain funds "to or for behoof of" the surviving child or children of the marriage, "in such shares or proportions, and subject to such conditions, provisions, and limitations" as the spouses or the survivor of them should appoint. By mutual trust-disposition and settlement, in exercise of the reserved power of appointment, the spouses directed their testamentary trustees to hold these funds for behoof of their children in equal shares, and to pay to them the income, it being provided that the shares of the sons should be paid at majority, and that in the case of the daughters the share of each should be settled upon her at marriage for her sole and exclusive use, and held by trustees for her behoof, "with power to her to dispose of the fee of the same by any testamentary deed, and failing her disposing of the same by such deed, the same shall be paid, assigned, and conveyed to her heirs and executors." In regard to the disposal of the fee of the shares of unmarried daughters the trustees were directed to pay or assign the same "according to the direction which each such daughter may leave by any testamentary deed," and failing the execution of such deed "to her heirs and executors." In a question raised after the death of the survivor of the spouses between the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement and the daughters (none of whom were married), who contended that their parents were not entitled to restrict their rights to a liferent with power to test, held that the appointment was valid. Wallace's Trustees v. Wallace, June 12, 1891, p. 921.

Faculties and powers—Conditions annexed to a gift—Ultra vires.

16. By antenuptial marriage-contract the trustees were directed after the death of the survivor of the spouses "to pay over" certain funds "to or for behoof of" the surviving child or children of the marriage, "in such shares or proportions, and subject to such conditions, provisions, and limitations" as the spouses or the survivor of them should appoint. By mutual trust-disposition and settlement, in exercise of the reserved power of appointment, the spouses directed their trustees in making payment to their children of their respective shares of the funds in question to take them bound to repay the same "in the event of such son or daughter succeeding to the said estate of L." The contingency had not occurred at the death of the survivor of the spouses. Held that the direction was ultra vires and ineffectual, but that its invalidity did not affect the appointment in other respects. Wallace's Trustees v. Wallace, June 12, 1891, p. 921.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Foreign—Interpretation of settlement—Lex domicilii—Lex loci actus.

17. Questions as to the interpretation of a mortis causa deed disposing of moveable estate must be solved by the law of the domicile of the granter of the deed, unless the deed shall disclose an intention on the part of its granter that some other law should be invoked. Circumstances which were held to be insufficient to displace the general rule. Smith v. Smiths, July 3, 1891, p. 1036.

Foreign—Domicile.

18. A Scotsman, who went in 1874 to reside in Manchester, in May 1889 executed a will in English form, in which he declared that his domicile was in England. He died in September 1889, and his executor obtained probate. The testator's only child having presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire to have it found that the testator died domiciled in Scotland, and obtained interim interdict against the executor distributing the funds without providing for payment of legitim, the executor on 16th December 1889 obtained from the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England an order that, inter alia, an inquiry should be made whether the testator was domiciled in England, and appointing a receiver to collect the estate. On 23d December 1889 the testator's daughter raised an action in the Court of Session, concluding for declarator that the testator was domiciled in Scotland, and that she was entitled to legitim. The Court, in respect that the question of domicile was before the Court in England, dismissed the action. Ferguson v. Buchanan, Nov. 15, 1890, p. 119.

Heritable and Moveable—Jus relictæ—Heritable security—Titles to Lands Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 117.

19. A testatrix directed her trustees "to hold, apply, pay, and convey the whole residue" of her estate for behoof of her three children. The trustees had a power to sell heritage, and to call up investments. One of the sons, who survived his mother, died after the residue had been divided with the exception of a heritable bond for £1500 which belonged to the deceased testatrix. In a question between the son's widow and daughter, held that the son's right in the bond was a moveable jus crediti, and was subject to jus relictæ. Gilligan v. Gilligan, Jan. 15, 1891, p. 387.

Heritable and Moveable—Heritable bond—Titles to Lands Act, 1868, sec. 117.

20. A truster directed her trustees to divide the residue of her "moveable means and estate" among certain persons, and, "with regard to the disposal and division or destination of" her "heritable estate," she directed it to be valued, and "divided, apportioned, and disposed of" to certain other persons. Besides other property, heritable and moveable, she died possessed of two bonds and dispositions in security in favour of herself and her executors or assignees whomsoever, and of a bond of annuity with disposition in security in favour of herself and her heirs or assignees whomsoever. Held that the three bonds were to be regarded as part of her moveable estate. Hughes' Trustees v. Corsane, Dec. 19, 1890, p. 299.

Heritable and Moveable—Conversion.

21. Circumstances in which it was held that the exercise of a power of sale was indispensable to the execution of the trust, and that therefore the heritage must be treated as moveable succession. Brown's Trustees v. Brown, Dec. 4, 1890, p. 185.

See also Heritable and Moveable, 4, 5.

Interest—Legacy.

22. Where the payment of a legacy was postponed for several years owing to the delay of the beneficiary to elect between her legal rights and the provisions under the trust-settlement, held that the legatee could not claim a higher rate of interest than had been actually received by the trustees down to the date of her election.

Per the Lord President and Lord M'Laren, that there is no general rule that the rate of interest payable on legacies is 5 per cent where the trustees are not in mora. Inglis' Trustees v. Breen, Feb. 6, 1891, p. 487.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

23. A testator bequeathed legacies of £10,000 to each of his children, declaring that these should be "payable as at my death, and on" the legatees "respectively attaining twenty-one years of age, or in the case of females, on their respective marriages before attaining said age, and the same shall not vest until the period of payment." Power was given to the trustees to advance the available income of the legacies for the education and maintenance, or otherwise for the benefit of the children respectively, and to anticipate, if they pleased, the period of vesting and payment. Held that the interest accruing on each legacy between the date of the testator's death and the period of payment belonged to the legatee. M'Lean's Trustees v. M'Leans, June 12, 1891, p. 892.

Jus relicti—Husband and Wife—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 6—Marriage prior to Act.

24. By antenuptial marriage-contract, entered into in 1862, a wife conveyed to trustees her whole estate, heritable and moveable, for payment of the free yearly income to herself during her life, exclusive of her husband's jus mariti and right of administration, and after her death for payment to her husband of an alimentary liferent of it, which was to cease on his entering into a second marriage. On the death of the spouses the capital was to be conveyed and paid to the issue of the marriage, if any, and failing them, to the wife's "own heirs whomsoever." The wife predeceased her husband, and there were no issue of the marriage. She left no further writing disposing of her estate. The husband took no benefit from his liferent, and married a second time shortly afterwards. In a special case, to which the husband and the wife's next of kin were parties, held that the former was entitled, under section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, to take one-half of his wife's estate. Simons' Trustee v. Neilson, Nov. 20, 1890, p. 135.

Liferent—Clause of forfeiture—Sale—Repugnancy.

25. In a disposition and settlement of landed estate there was a destination of the subjects to one person in liferent and his issue in fee, whom failing, to certain other persons in liferent and fee respectively. The disposition also declared that all who took a beneficial right under it were "prohibited from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of such interest, excepting always sales or mortgages by parties who are absolute fiars"; such sales or mortgages were declared void, and parties signing them were to lose all their rights under the settlement, and give place to the next in succession. Held that the clauses of prohibition and forfeiture were valid and effectual to prevent a sale by the liferenter of his liferent right. Chaplins' Trustees v. Hoile, Oct. 30, 1890, p. 27.

Marriage-contract—Vesting—Alimentary provision—Discharge.

26. Held (1) that a clause in a marriage-contract giving, in certain events, the trustees power to pay over the capital on obtaining the husband's discharge of his liferent shewed that it was not intended that the trust should be kept up for the protection of his liferent; (2) that the terms in which provisions to children were expressed in a clause providing for the event of the husband's predecease, making the failure of children "without issue" a condition precedent to the wife's will affecting the capital in the event of her children surviving her and dying before the term of payment, shewed that the provisions to "children" in the clause providing for the event of the wife's predecease were limited to children of the marriage, excluding their issue, and that in the event of the son dying before the term of vesting, whether he left or did not leave issue, the capital would vest in the husband under his wife's will, and therefore that the capital must ultimately vest either in the son or the father, and that they were entitled to payment on their joint discharge. Edwardes v. Hughes, Dec. 19, 1890, p. 319.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Testament—Construction—Legacy to children described as of a certain number—Postnati.

27. A testatrix directed her trustees to divide the free residue of her estate "equally among the children of my late brother A, of whom there are nine, the children of my brother B, of whom there are ten, and the children of my brother C, of whom there are seven, who may survive me." At the date of the will B had ten children. Before the death of the testatrix three other children were born to him. All B's children survived the testatrix. Held that all the children of B were entitled to share in the residue. Millar's Trustees v. Rattray, June 26, 1891, p. 989.

Testament—Construction—"Relatives"—Stirpes or capita.

28. A truster directed that the residue of his estate should be "equally divided amongst all my relatives, my sister Maria to get a half more than the others." Of his four sisters and two brothers only one—Maria—survived him, but several nephews and nieces did. Held that the testator's sister and all his nephews and nieces were entitled to share in the residue per stirpes, the sister receiving half as much again as any of the other stirpes. Cunningham's Trustees v. Cunningham, Jan. 13, 1891, p. 380.

Testament—Construction—"Survivors."

29. "Survivors" not construed as equivalent to "others." Hairsten's Judicial Factor v. Duncan, July 14, 1891, p. 1158.

Testament—Holograph—Adoption of writing not holograph—Will partly printed, partly holograph.

30. A B, a domiciled Scotsman, resident in Shanghai, filled up, dated, and signed a printed form of a will drawn in English style, but left the annexed attestation schedule blank, there being no subscribing witnesses. The form contained blanks (1) for the name of the testator, (2) for the names of the legatees, and (3) for the name of an executor. In the first A B inserted his own name and designation, in the second the names of his two brothers, and the words "equally and jointly, if one deceased to the survivor only," and in the third the name of a friend. The words of bequest and the description of the subjects were in print. The whole document, with the manuscript insertions, read as a bequest by A B of his whole heritable and moveable property to his two brothers. The execution of the will was defective according to the law of England, the lex loci, but it was founded on as a valid will by the law of Scotland. Held (diss. Lord M'Laren) that the document could not receive effect as a holograph will. Macdonald v. Cuthbertson, Nov. 14, 1890, p. 101.

Testament—Reduction—Proving of the tenor—Title to sue.

31. Where the heir-at-law and the next of kin of a person deceased brought an action for reduction of certain testamentary deeds executed by the deceased on the ground of facility and circumvention, and for declarator that the succession of the deceased was to be regulated by a prior testamentary deed under which they were residuary legatees, the pursuers did not produce the prior deed founded on, and the defenders alleged that it had been destroyed animo revocandi. The pursuers then added an averment that they were respectively heir-at-law and next of kin of the deceased. Held that having the alternative title of heirs ab intestato and disponees under the deed alleged to have been revoked, they had a title to sue a reduction of later deeds granted to their prejudice, and that the validity of these deeds fell to be decided in the first place in order that a proving of the tenor of the prior deed might be brought. Gilchrist v. Morrison, Feb. 28, 1891, p. 600.

Testament—Revocation—Conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit—Pencil alterations.

32. A solicitor, on 5th February 1884, made a holograph will in favour of his parents should they survive him, and failing them in favour of his nephew. A year afterwards he married, executing a marriage-contract in which he settled part of his estate upon his wife and children. He died in 1889, leaving a widow and children. After his death the will was found in his repositories altered in pencil in favour of his wife and daughter. The alterations were in his handwriting, but were neither initialed nor signed, and had no date attached to them. Held (1) that the will as it originally stood became inoperative by reason of the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit, and (2) that the pencil alterations were to be regarded merely as converting the will into a draft for another will to be afterwards made. Munro's Executors v. Munro, Nov. 18, 1890, p. 122.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

33. Held that the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit did not apply to a will in respect (1) that it was executed by the testator in the knowledge that his wife was pregnant, and (2) that it was not a general disposition disposing of the universitas of his estate. Adamson's Trustees v. Adamson's Executors, July 14, 1891, p. 1133.

Revocation.

34. Held that where a testator recalled by a codicil all provisions made in favour of a particular person, and directed her trustees to dispose of the estate so set free among her relatives "according to their legal rights," the person originally favoured was not thereby prevented from taking a share of the latter bequest as one of the heirs in mobilibus. Johnston's Trustees v. Johnston, May 13, 1891, p. 823.

Revocation—Revocation of "previous testaments"—Revocable bond of annuity.

35. The heir in possession of an entailed estate granted in favour of his wife a bond of annuity under the Aberdeen Act providing her an annuity out of the estate "during all the days of her life after my decease, in case she shall survive me." He reserved power to revoke the bond. Subsequently he executed a trust-disposition and settlement prepared by a law-agent, whereby he revoked "all previous settlements and all writings of a testamentary nature, with the exception of" the bond of annuity. By a later holograph will he revoked "all previous wills or testaments." Held that the holograph will did not revoke the bond of annuity. Maclean v. Maclean, June 5, 1891, p. 874.

Vesting—Revocation of destination over.

36. A testator directed her trustees to "hold, apply, and dispose of" one-half of the residue of her estate to her nephew, payable on his attaining the age of twenty-five, directing her trustees to hold the capital in trust for him till he reached that age, but empowering them to expend the interest for his behoof, and to advance to him sums out of capital; there was then a destination over to a brother of the testator and his children, in the event of the nephew failing to attain twenty-five. By a codicil the testator recalled all the provisions in her settlement in favour of her brother and his children. Held that, the destination over being thus recalled, the nephew's interest vested a morte testatoris. Johnston's Trustees v. Johnston, May 13, 1891, p. 823.

Vesting—Trust—Direction to convey to beneficiary on occurrence of a certain event.

37. A testator directed his trustees to invest in their names one-third of the residue of his estate and to pay the interest to his daughter, A B, during her life for her aliment and support. The deed then proceeded, "Upon the death of the said A B, I appoint the said third part of said residue" to be divided among A B's children, declaring that it should be payable to each as they respectively attained majority. In the event of a child dying before receiving payment of his or her share leaving lawful children, such children were to succeed to the share, and if a child should die before receiving his or her share but leaving no lawful children, such child's share was to be equally divided among the surviving children and the lawful children of other predeceasing children. After all the children of the daughter had attained majority, their mother desired to renounce her life-rent, and they with her consent sought declarator that the right to the one-third of residue had vested in them. Held that no right was conferred upon the children until the death of their mother. Forbes v. M'Condach's Trustees, Dec. 12, 1890, p. 230.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

38. A testator directed his trustees to pay certain legacies and annuities, and to pay the interest of the residue, "after deducting the foregoing bequests and annuities," to his widow during her life, "and at the death of the said" widow and the other annuitants, "I request my trustees to divide the said residue into nine equal shares, and to pay one ninth share to" a nephew, and the remaining shares to other persons. The nephew predeceased the widow. Held that the share of residue had vested in the nephew at the testator's death. Home's Trustees, July 14, 1891, p. 1138.

Vesting—Succession "after these payments are made."

39. A testator after making certain provisions for his wife and leaving legacies to each of his daughters, payable after their mother's death, declared that his son was "to succeed to whatever may remain of my estate after these payments are made, whom failing" to his daughters. The wife, the son, and the daughters all survived the testator. The son predeceased his mother and sisters. In a question between the widow as one of the heirs in mobilibus of her son, and the daughters, who claimed the whole residue as conditional institutes, held that the words "after these payments are made," did not refer to a point of time, but meant "subject to these payments," and that the residue vested in the son a morte testatoris. Scott's Trustees v. Scott, July 17, 1891, p. 1194.

See Error—Partnership, 3—Trust.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Prescription—Possession.

1. The vassal in possession of certain lands, held under a lord of erection, in 1818 obtained from the Crown a charter of confirmation, and in 1841 a charter of resignation and confirmation, which bore that the lands were to be holden of the Sovereign as immediate lawful superior,—coming in place of the monastery and abbey of Melrose by virtue of the Acts of Annexation,—for a reddendo of 10s. Scots, payable to the Crown or its donatory, the lord of erection. The vassal for the prescriptive period paid to the lord of erection £3, 10s. Scots, which was the reddendo stipulated in a charter of the lands granted in 1627 by the lord of erection, and on which various writs by progress had followed down to 1776. No vassal had entered with the lord of erection, as superior, after 1776. The lord of erection having raised an action against the vassal for payment of a casualty, as having been impliedly entered with him as superior in 1874, the vassal pleaded that he had prescribed a right to hold of the Crown, and explained the payment made by him as being a payment to the donatory of the Crown under the crown charter. The discrepancy between the sum actually paid and the reddendo in that charter he explained by producing a correspondence in 1866 between the agents of the parties, from which it appeared that a question having then been raised as to whether the reddendo was £3, 10s. or 10s. Scots annually, the vassal agreed to pay the larger sum rather than raise any question. From that correspondence it appeared that the pursuer's agents were then made aware of the existence of the crown charter, and claimed the payments as due to their client as lord of erection and donatory of the Crown, not as feudal superior. Held that the vassal had by prescription obtained right to hold of the Crown, and must be assoilzied. Duke of Buccleuch v. Boyd, Oct. 21, 1890, p. 1.

2. A person in possession of lands which were alleged to be kirk lands resigned them in 1806 to the Crown for new infeftment and took a charter on a blench tenure for a penny Scots si peteretur tantum. Up to this date the lands had been held in feu of a subject-superior (who held his superiority under a strict entail), for a reddendo of £6 Scots. After obtaining the crown charter the vassal held the lands for more than the prescriptive period, but paid the feu-duty of £6 Scots to the subject-superior, who remained infeft in the superiority; no payment was ever demanded by the Crown, except some payment on the charter being granted, the character of which was not ascertained. Some of the vassals from 1806 downwards were enrolled as freeholders, and voted as such. The subject-superior having in 1871 brought against the vassal a reduction of the crown title, as having been unwarrantably obtained in prejudice of his rights as superior, the vassal pleaded prescription. Held (per Lord Gifford, Ordinary) that there had been no sufficient possession by the vassal on that title, and the plea of prescription repelled, and the title reduced. Duke of Roxburghe v. Scott, Oct. 21, 1890, p. 8.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Entry—Casualty—Composition—Relief—Trust.

3. By an inter vivos trust-disposition dated in 1810 a proprietor (not entered with the superior) of lands inherited from a deceased ancestor who was a singular successor of the last entered vassal and who held an a me infeftment unconfirmed, disponed the lands to trustees for the following purposes, viz., (1st) for payment of the expenses attending the execution of the trust; (2d) for payment to himself during his life and the subsistence of the trust of a free yearly annuity of £3000, of which £400 was to be paid to his wife during her life and the subsistence of the trust; (3d) for payment of all the just and lawful debts then owing by him; and (4th) in the event of his death, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of any deed of settlement executed or to be executed by him in favour of his wife and children or any other person or persons. Power was granted to the trustees (with the truster's written consent) to sell any part of the lands disponed to them, and the proceeds of the lands, if any, so sold were directed to be applied in the payment of all the just and lawful debts due by the truster, and any residue of money in their hands was directed to be paid to the truster's heirs and assignees, secluding executors. The trust-deed further provided that the trustees should reconvey the remainder of the said lands and estates and other heritable property which should not have been disposed of when the debts had been fully paid off, or if required by writing under the hand of the truster, should so reconvey the lands to the truster at Martinmas 1814 whether the debts had been paid off or not. The truster died in 1811. In 1815 the trustees having obtained decree of adjudication in implement against the truster's heir, and having been infeft thereon, were entered with the superior, but as trustees for the uses and purposes of the trust-deed only, by charter of sale, adjudication, and confirmation, which recited the grounds of the trustees' right, and confirmed the dispositions and unconfirmed infeftments since the date of the last vassal's entry. The trustees paid composition on entry. In 1860 they granted a conveyance of such of the lands as they had not sold to the truster's heir-at-law, who was infeft thereon, and was thereby in 1874 entered with the superior in virtue of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4. The last surviving trustee died in 1863. The vassal tendered relief-duty; the superior demanded composition. Held that the cases of Stuart v. Jackson, 17 R. 851, Duke of Athole v. Stewart, 17 R. 724, and Duke of Athole v. Menzies, 17 R. 733, did not apply, and that the heir was liable in payment of composition, (a) in respect that the entry of the trustees created a new investiture, and was not a mere burden on the former investiture, and (b) in respect that even if it did not create a new investiture, the heir was not the heir of an investiture recognised by the superior, as his ancestor had not been entered in his lifetime, and as the subsequent confirmation by the superior operated retro only to the effect of confirming prior conveyances and unconfirmed infeftments as transmissions necessary to complete the title of the vassal in whose favour the confirmation was granted. Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone, Feb. 28, 1891, p. 587.

Feu-contract—Building restrictions—Jus quæsitum—Rights of feuars inter se—Nuisance—Dean of Guild.

4. A piece of ground in a residential district in Glasgow was feued to different persons by feu-contracts which were practically identical in terms. The feuars were taken bound to erect houses, and were prohibited from carrying on certain enumerated kinds of business on the ground feued, "or to carry on any other business though not above enumerated which may be nauseous or hurtful to the neighbouring feuars . . . in whose favour it is hereby declared that this provision shall operate as a servitude upon the lands hereby feued." The contracts further contained stipulations limiting the height of buildings to be erected, and as to the making of sewers, and it was declared that these provisions should be inserted in all subsequent dispositions of the lands "until complete fulfilment thereof, otherwise the same shall be void and null." The North British Railway Company, who had acquired one of the feus, applied to the Dean of Guild of Glasgow for authority to erect a shaft on their feu for the ventilation of a tunnel in an underground railway. The superior did not oppose, but objections were lodged by some of the co-feuars. The Dean refused the petition. On appeal the Court recalled his deliverance, holding (1) with regard to the prohibitions which were declared to be a servitude that there was no contravention unless the proposed erection could be regarded as the carrying on of a nauseous or hurtful business, and that it was premature to decide that the shaft would be nauseous or hurtful; and (2) with regard to the other prohibitions that there was no such mutuality of rights and obligations between the feuars established either expressly or by implication as to give the objectors a jus quæsitum which would entitle them to enforce the building restrictions contained in the feu-contracts. North British Railway Co. v. Moore, July 1, 1891, p. 1021.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

See Property, 3.

SUSPENSION. See Jurisdiction, 7.

TEINDS. Subvaluation—Decree of approbation.

1. A report of subcommissioners of teinds has no effect as a valuation until it has been approved by the High Commission or by the Court of Teinds. Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope, Jan. 23, 1891, p. 445.

Jurisdiction—Reduction of locality subject to qualification.

2. In 1888 the proprietor of the lands of B. obtained decree of approbation of a report by subcommissioners in 1630 valuing his teinds. In 1890 he brought a reduction of a locality approved final in 1868, in which a stipend in excess of the teinds as reported to be the value in the subvaluation of 1630 had been localled upon his lands. He sought to have the locality set aside as erroneous ab initio, on the ground that the teinds were valued by the subcommissioners in 1630, and that their report had been eventually approved by the Court of Teinds. The Court of Teinds granted decree of reduction, but the decree "to have effect only from and after the date of the decree of approbation, 16th July 1888, for the second half of the crop of 1888, and in all time coming." Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope, Jan. 23, 1891, p. 445.

Subvaluation—Summons of approbation—Decreet—Ambiguity—Construction—Prescription.

3. In a report in 1629 of a valuation by subcommissioners of lands and teinds in a parish, the lands of P. were reported to be of the value of forty bolls victual. In a note appended to the report, the lands of D. were declared to be "nocht valued becaus yai ar sett decimis inclusis." In 1797 an action of approbation and valuation was brought by A and B. The extract decreet in the action set forth that the action was brought by A as proprietor of the lands of P., and by B as "infeft" in part of the lands of D., "with pertinents . . . and which lands of D. were formerly part of the said lands of P."; that the report of the subcommissioners of 1629 had valued the lands of P.; that therefore that report ought to be approved "in so far as concerns the valuation of the pursuers' lands before specified"; that the pursuers appeared by their procurators, who produced the report of the subcommissioners, "and particularly the valuation of the pursuers' lands libelled, and appearance was made for the TEINDS—Continued.

Officers of State"; that the Lords thereupon ratified, allowed, and approved the said report, in so far as concerned the "valuation of the pursuers' lands libelled" and interponed their decreet and authority thereto, and found and declared in terms thereof that the yearly avail of the stock and teind of the lands of P. were and should be in all time coming forty bolls victual, and decerned "conform to conclusions of the libel." More than forty years after the date of the decree the proprietor of the part of D. which belonged to B objected to be localled on for augmentation of stipend, maintaining that his part of D. had been valued under the above decree. Another proprietor lodged answers in which he maintained (1) that the decree of approbation, when fairly construed along with the report, which it expressly approved, did not value the lands of D.; or otherwise (2) that there was a latent ambiguity in the decree, which fell to be explained by documentary evidence. Held (1) that the decree valued the part of the lands of D. which belonged to B as having formed part of the lands of P. at the date of the subvaluation; and (2) that the objections stated to it were extrinsic objections which could not be maintained after the lapse of forty years. Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby, Jan. 16, 1891, p. 407.

Procedure in locality—Res judicata.

4. An augmentation of stipend having been granted and modified a process of locality followed in which in 1850 an interim scheme was approved. To this scheme the Lord Advocate, as having right on behalf of the Crown to the bishops' teinds, lodged objections, in which he stated that the teinds of the lands of D. and certain other lands in the parish, the teinds of which were held on heritable rights, were unvalued. He objected to the scheme in so far as it laid no portion of the augmentation upon the teinds of these lands. The common agent lodged a note in which he admitted that the teinds of certain of the lands in question, including the lands of D., were unvalued, and stated what he believed to be their rental. In 1858 the Lord Advocate lodged a note stating that he was satisfied with the extent to which the common agent had given effect to his objections as regarded the rents stated for the lands which were let unvalued, including the lands of D., and he craved the Lord Ordinary to sustain the objections, and to remit to the clerk to rectify the locality, and to allocate the augmentation primo loco on the teinds of these lands. By interlocutor of 25th June 1858, the Lord Ordinary allowed the note to be received and seen, and by interlocutor of 9th July he remitted to the clerk to rectify the locality and to report. This interlocutor was not reclaimed against. The clerk reported a rectified scheme, but it was never approved final, and no further proceedings took place in the locality until after a new augmentation was granted in 1873. In 1890 the question was raised whether the teinds of the lands of D. were valued or unvalued. The party alleging that the teinds were not valued pleaded res judicata in respect of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 9th July 1858. Held that the interlocutor of 9th July 1858 did not support the plea. Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby, Jan. 16, 1891, p. 407.

TIME. See Bankruptcy, 6.

TITLE TO SUE. Agent and Principal.

1. When a person enters into a contract in his own name for an undisclosed principal, the latter, on disclosing himself as principal, has a title to sue upon the contract, but is subject to all pleas which the defender could have maintained against the agent if the latter had raised the action. Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co., June 19, 1891, p. 975.

Jus tertii—Adjudication—Discharge—Statute 1621, cap. 6.

2. The debtor in an obligation for payment of an annuity has no title to plead, in answer to a demand for payment by a person who has adjudged the creditor's right, that the adjudger's right has been extinguished by payment of the debt on which the adjudication proceeded. Macleod's Trustees v. Murray, May, 21, 1891, p. 830.

TITLE TO SUE—Continued.

Unincorporated society—Competency of action—Patrimonial interest.

3. The Renton Football Club, an unincorporated society, its office-bearers, and five persons described as members of the club, sued the Scottish Football Association, also an unincorporated society, its office-bearers, and the members of certain committees, for reduction of a minute of the defenders deciding that the pursuers' club be declared professional and expelled from the association. The pursuers averred that they had been illegally expelled from the association of which they were members; that as members they enjoyed several pecuniary advantages which they would lose by expulsion; and that they had been duly authorised at a meeting of the club to sue the action. The secretary of the association, several members of its general committee, and all the members of the "professional committee" appeared, and pleaded, inter alia, (1) that the pursuers had no title to sue, inasmuch as they did not represent and had no authority to use the name of the Renton Football Club; and (2) that the Scottish Football Association being an unincorporated society could only be sued by calling its individual members. It was admitted that the association had several thousand members. The Court allowed the pursuers a proof of their averment that they were duly authorised at a meeting of the club to sue the action, and repelled the second plea. Renton Football Club v. M'Dowall, March 13, 1891, p. 670.

Reduction—Proving of the tenor.

4. Where the heir-at-law and the next of kin of a person deceased brought an action for reduction of certain testamentary deeds executed by the deceased on the ground of facility and circumvention, and for declarator that the succession of the deceased was to be regulated by a prior testamentary deed under which they were residuary legatees, the pursuers did not produce the prior deed founded on, and the defenders alleged that it had been destroyed animo revocandi. The pursuers then added an averment that they were respectively heir-at-law and next of kin of the deceased. Held that having the alternative title of heirs ab intestato and disponees under the deed alleged to have been revoked, they had a title to sue a reduction of later deeds granted to their prejudice, and that the validity of these deeds fell to be decided in the first place. Gilchrist v. Morrison, Feb. 28, 1891, p. 599.

See Bankruptcy, 5—Company, 5—Succession, 11.

TRADE INCORPORATION. See Burgh, 9.

TRUST. Administration—Expenses—Fee and Liferent.

1. In a trust-settlement the testator directed his trustees "in the first place," "to pay all my just and lawful debts . . . and the expenses of every kind connected with the execution of the trust hereby created. . . . In the seventh place, I direct my trustees after fulfilling the foregoing purposes, to hold the residue of my estate for behoof of my said wife in liferent, . . . and . . . to pay to my said wife the free annual produce of the said residue as and when the same is received by my trustees." The testator then gave directions as to the disposal of the residue on his wife's death. Held that all expenses connected with the examination of investments from time to time and changes in them fell to be paid out of capital and not out of income. Smith v. Bennie, Oct. 30, 1890, p. 44.

Directions to trustees to manage estate, after it had vested in beneficiary, until beneficiary attained twenty-five years of age—Repugnancy.

2. A testator directed his trustees to hold and manage, "as absolute proprietors," certain heritable property for behoof of his second son until the latter attained the age of twenty-five, when they were to denude in his favour, declaring that the property should not vest in him till he attained the age of twenty-five, or married with the consent of the trustees after attaining the age of twenty-one. The testator also directed his trustees to the whole residue of his moveable estate in certain shares for his children. The vesting-clause was in similar terms to the vesting-clause regarding the heritage, but there was no similar direction as to management. The trustees were, however, given an unlimited discretion as to the application of the annual interest of the shares of residue, and it was declared that on the sons' attaining the age of twenty-five, and the daughters attaining that age or being married, they were to be entitled absolutely to any accumulations of interest on their respective shares, and the trustees were directed to pay over the same to them accordingly. The son, after attaining the age of twenty-one, but before attaining the age of twenty-five, married, with the approval of the trustees. Held by a majority of seven Judges that the son's right to the heritage and to his share of the moveable estate having vested in him upon his marriage with the consent of the trustees, he became then entitled to call upon the trustees to denude in his favour. Miller's Trustees v. Miller, Dec. 9, 1890, p. 301.

TRUST—Continued.

Powers—Investments.

3. A truster gave a general power to his trustees to continue to hold the investments which he might have at the time of his death in any public companies, "and power to invest the funds . . . which shall devolve upon my daughter in heritage and preference stocks of railways in Scotland or England, and in the stock of Scotch banks." Held that it was competent for the trustees to hold the funds liferented by the daughter in the shape of shares in public trading companies, which were held by the testator at the time of his death, they being bound, however, to exercise their discretion from time to time as to the expediency of retaining them. Thomson's Trustees v. Henderson, Oct. 25, 1890, p. 24.

See Judicial Factor, 7.

Powers—Sale.

4. Held that a power given by a testator to his trustees to sell his heritable estate, with the exception of certain lands, implied a prohibition against selling the excepted lands. Whyte's Factor v. Whyte, Jan. 10, 1891, p. 376.

Adverse title made up by accepting trustee—Deathbed.

5. Held that a trustee under a settlement executed on deathbed did not commit a breach of trust in completing his own title as heir-at-law to the heritage conveyed, and in disregarding the deathbed conveyance in favour of a stranger. Thain v. Thain, July 18, 1891, p. 1196.

Jurisdiction—Forum non conveniens.

6. In an action by a legatee against two trustees who had taken out confirmation in Scotland under a Scotch trust-deed, the trustees pleaded no jurisdiction in respect that they were not resident in Scotland, and that the whole estate had been distributed twelve years before. The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the plea, holding that the jurisdiction once constituted against them by their obtaining confirmation, and acting as trustees under a Scottish trust, remained unaffected. M'Gennis v. Rooney, March 20, 1891, p. 817.

7. Jurisdiction of English Court to determine right of administration of English heritage belonging to a Scotsman. Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson, March 20, 1891, p. 793.

See Discharge, 2—River—Road.

VALUATION ACTS. Valuation-roll—Sublease.

1. Where subjects are sublet, the only rent which ought to appear in the Valuation-roll under the heading "Yearly rent or value" is the rent paid by the principal tenant to the owner. The occupier's column may, however, contain in addition to the name of the principal tenant that of the subtenant, with the rent paid by him and the extent of his occupation. Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Assessor for County of Fife, June 13, 1891, p. 948.

Lease—Agreement—Dwelling-houses in connection with colliery—Consideration other than rent.

2. During the currency of a mineral lease for thirty-one years, under which the rent payable by the tenants was a royalty on the output of coal, the landlord and tenants entered into an agreement with a view to extend the mineral workings, under which the tenants were to erect certain additional miners' houses upon the lands belonging to the landlord, but then let to an agricultural tenant. The mineral tenants were to be entitled to repay themselves the cost of erection by retaining the royalties over and above a certain sum per annum, on condition of erecting an equal number and value of houses on ground belonging to themselves. The houses on the landlord's property were to be maintained and insured against fire by the tenants, who were also to settle the claims of the agricultural tenant for the land taken for the houses, and to relieve the landlord of certain assessments. At the termination of the lease the houses, so far as paid for out of the royalties, were to be left to the landlord, and quoad ultra he was to have the right to take them over at a valuation, and failing his doing so the tenants were to be entitled to remove the materials. Houses were erected on the landlord's lands under this agreement, and were in the occupation of miners, who paid a rent to the tenants. The assessor entered them at that rent as the property of the tenants. The Court held that the entry was wrong, being of opinion (1) that the agreement fell to be read as part of the lease; (2) that it contained no consideration other than the rent, with the exception of the sum paid for insurance; and therefore (3) that with the exception of the latter sum the subjects were covered by the royalty payable under the mineral lease. Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Assessor for County of Fife, June 13, 1891, p. 944.

Lease—Meliorations—Sum paid by incoming to outgoing tenants—Consideration other than rent.

3. The incoming tenant of a farm let to him for nineteen years at a rent of £500 paid to the outgoing tenants a sum of money for meliorations payable to them by the landlord under the expiring lease. His lease contained the stipulation that he should be entitled at its termination to repayment from the landlord of the sum so paid by him, or of such other sum not exceeding it, as the meliorations should then be valued at. Held that as the payment by the tenant relieved his landlord of an obligation which he would otherwise have had to meet, there was a consideration other than the rent, and that a sum equivalent to four per cent on it fell to be added to the rent contained in the lease. Duke of Fife v. Assessor for County of Elgin, June 13, 1891, p. 941.

Public-house—Goodwill—Consideration other than rent.

4. The proprietor and occupier of a public-house having died intestate leaving a son and daughter, both in minority, his law-agents acting generally in the interests of the heir and executor, accepted an offer of £660 for the goodwill of the business, shop-fittings, &c., made on condition of the offerer obtaining a transfer of the licence, and a five years' lease of the premises at £80 per annum. The rent of £80 was a full rent for the premises when used as a licensed public-house, the value of the premises without the licence being about £30. The value of the shop-fittings, &c., was £150. The £510 paid for goodwill had not been apportioned between the heir and the executor, and there was no evidence that any part of it belonged to the heir. Held that as it had not been proved that any part of the £510 belonged to the heir the latter sum could not be regarded as a consideration other than the rent stipulated for in the lease, and that therefore the premises fell to be valued at £80. M'Farlane and Dailly v. Assessor for Dundee, June 13, 1891, p. 939.

Cemetery—Yearly value.

5. Held that one-half of the net profits of a cemetery company was a reasonable sum to take as representing the annual value of the land belonging to the company and used as a cemetery. Aberdeen Cemetery Co. Limited, v. Assessor of Aberdeen, June 13, 1891, p. 936.

Bank buildings with dwelling-houses occupied by bank officials—Cumulo or separate valuation.

premises of a bank, including the banking-office and the dwelling-houses

VALUATION ACTS—Continued.

of two bank officials, were entered in the Valuation-roll as a unum quid at one cumulo valuation. The bank appealed, and maintained that the offices and dwelling-houses ought to be separately valued in order to satisfy the purposes of a local Act, which in authorising an assessment made a distinction between the assessment of dwelling-houses and offices. The houses formed part of the main bank buildings—one of them had internal communication with the office and the other had not. Held that the dwelling-house which had no internal communication with the business premises ought to be separately valued, and that the dwelling-house which had such communication ought to be valued along with the office as a unum quid. Bank of Scotland v. Assessor for Edinburgh, June 13, 1891, p. 936.

Buildings unlet and unfit for occupation.

7. A piece of ground in the neighbourhood of a large manufacturing town was let to the Crown for 94 years, and buildings thereon were occupied as military barracks. On the expiration of this lease the buildings reverted to the proprietor, and were unoccupied. They were entered in the roll at £305, the rent at which they were entered when occupied by the Crown. It was proved that they could not be let without considerable outlay being made to alter their condition. The Court reduced the valuation to £100 consented to by the proprietor. Earl of Home v. Assessor for Dundee, June 13, 1891, p. 934.

WRIT. Authentication—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 39.

1. The testing-clause of a recorded disposition of heritage bore, inter alia, that the disposition had been subscribed by Hugh James Rollo (one of the granters) "before these witnesses, William Robertson, apprentice, and John Alexander James, clerk, both to me, the said Hugh James Rollo." The subscription of one of the witnesses to what bore to be Rollo's subscription was "William Roberton, witness." A proof, allowed in a petition under the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, established that William Roberton, apprentice to Rollo, had attested Rollo's subscription by subscribing the words "William Roberton, witness," appearing on the disposition in question. Held that the discrepancy between "Robertson" and "Roberton" was an informality of execution within the meaning of the 39th section of the Act, that that section therefore applied, and, looking to the proof, that the petition fell to be granted. Richardson's Trustees, July 11, 1891, p. 1131.

Informality of execution—Proof—Onus—Conveyancing Act, 1874, secs. 38 and 39.

2. Where a person alleged that a deed, without a testing-clause, bearing to be signed by him and by attesting witnesses had not been signed by him, and it was proved that the witnesses had signed but had not seen the alleged granter sign or heard him acknowledge the subscription, and where the person founding on the deed did not prove that the granter had signed it, held that the deed could not receive effect.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that when a deed is irregularly executed by reason of the persons signing as witnesses not having seen the granter subscribe or heard him acknowledge the subscription, the deed will be effectual if it is proved that the granter signed it. Geddes v. Reid, July 16, 1891, p. 1186.

Pencil alterations.

3. A solicitor, on 5th February 1884, made a holograph will in favour of his parents should they survive him, and failing them in favour of his nephew. A year afterwards he married, executing a marriage-contract in which he settled part of his estate upon his wife and children. He died in 1889, leaving a widow and children. After his death the will was found in his repositories altered in pencil in favour of his wife and daughter. The alterations were in his handwriting, but were neither initialed nor signed, and had no date attached to them. Held (1) that the will as it originally stood became inoperative by reason of the conditio si testator sine liberis

WRIT—Continued.

decesserit, and (2) that the pencil alterations were to be regarded merely as converting the will into a draft for another will to be afterwards made. Munro's Executors v. Munro, Nov. 18, 1890, p. 122.

Holograph—Adoption of writing not holograph—Will partly printed, partly holograph.

4. A B, a domiciled Scotsman, resident in Shanghai, filled up, dated, and signed a printed form of a will drawn in English style, but left the annexed attestation schedule blank, there being no subscribing witnesses. The form contained blanks (1) for the name of the testator, (2) for the names of the legatees, and (3) for the name of an executor. In the first A B inserted his own name and designation, in the second the names of his two brothers, and the words "equally and jointly, if one deceased to the survivor only," and in the third the name of a friend. The words of bequest and the description of the subjects were in print. The whole document, with the manuscript insertions, read as a bequest by A B of his whole heritable and moveable property to his two brothers. The execution of the will was defective according to the law of England, the lex loci, but it was founded on as a valid will by the law of Scotland. Held (diss. Lord M'Laren) that the document could not receive effect as a holograph will. Macdonald v. Cuthbertson, Nov. 14, 1890, p. 101.

GEORGE ROBB & CO., THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

Stanford Law Library
3 6105 062 686 915